The Decline of Darwinism

IN a recently published book entitled God and Science, Professor Elie de Cyon, a famous Russo-French scientist and a member of the Faculty of Sciences in St. Petersburg University, has struck what may prove to be a final blow at the declining theories of Darwinism. Professor de Cyon's book is recognized as the ablest work on the subject that has appeared in half a century at least.

A writer in the Record of Christian Work gives an intelligent and accurate summary of the main points of the volume. He says:

"M. de Cyon points out that theories of a mechanical evolution were opposed by a far larger group in the scientific world thirty years ago than is generally realized. Among the enemies of Darwinism were such men as Virchow, Von Baer, Florens, Milne-Edwards, Claude Bernard, and Quatrefages. But their opposition was either too timid or too disdainful to be effective. 'The atheistic evolutionary speculation found immense popular vogue among those who desired to see the Creator dethroned, who wished to be delivered from religion and the restraints imposed by the moral law on covetousness and human passion.' It found browbeating exponents in men like Haeckel, and succeeded, for the time, in silencing objections.

"The two bases of Darwinism are the natural selection of the fittest and the hereditary transmission of characteristics acquired in the struggle for existence. It is curious to note that these bases have been broken down by two evolutionists, H. Spencer and Weismann.

"Although recognizing Darwin's honesty of character, M. de Cyon is not greatly impressed with his capacities for generalization. 'His intelligence was built rather for purely descriptive sciences. He was not equipped intellectually for making large philosophical inductions. He too often confused analogy with identity to be a safe guide.' M. de Cyon further points out, as the German zoologist, Krause, has also done, that all the fundamental theories of Darwinian evolutionism are to be found sharply defined in the poetical effusions of Erasmus Darwin, the grandfather of Charles Darwin. Credit, however, is nowhere given for this family heritage."

Concerning Professor Haeckel, of Germany, who stands as the great popularizer of Darwinism, Professor de Cyon writes:

"Among Haeckel's innumerable works published in all tongues and issued in thousands of copies, one searches in vain for a single thought emanating from him which is worthy of preservation." Professor Chwolson, the eminent physicist of St. Petersburg, says: "All that Haeckel explains and affirms concerning questions of physics is false, and shows an ignorance of the most elementary problems, which is hardly believable," and F. Paulsen, the late Berlin University professor, adds: "I have read the World Riddle of Haeckel, and have reddened with shame at the thought of the general education of our people! That such a book should be possible, that it should be written, printed, bought, read, admired, and taken seriously by the nation of Kant, Goethe, and Schopenhauer, is a sad fact indeed." M. de Cyon points out that the falsifications of plates, which Dr. Arnold Brass has recently discovered in Haeckel's books, are no new thing. A year earlier, Professor His called attention to the fact that Haeckel was picturing part of a dog, a chicken, and a mole, with a single plate labeled in three different ways. Yet, for decades, Haeckel's books have been given to students for consultation by our innocent American professors. For decades this mountebank has imposed on the international public as a king in the world of thought.

"Lamarckism and Darwinism," Professor de Cyon says, "mark but passing phases in the history of science. They offer but fragments of truth. Presented as dogmatic theories, they are but an obstacle to progress. Let us have the courage to confess that we have not, up to the present, advanced a single step toward the solution of this problem [origin of species]."

The theory of an apish ancestry for man, he declares pure assumption. "No proof of this theory can ever be given from discovered fossils"; and Virchow says: "I have never found a single ape skull which approaches at all the human one. Between men and apes there exists a line of sharp demarcation. If we compare known fossil men with men of to-day, we can boldly affirm that individuals of a low development are much more numerous, relatively, among present-day men, than among fossils." In other words, the race is degenerate rather than the fruit of an exquisite development.

What psychological truth or what historical fact has ever been demonstrated by experimental proofs approaching, even at a distance, those which demonstrate the divine origin of the Gospel's revelations? he asks, and the answer is: "The culture of the entire civilized world and the history of myriads brought out of ignorance and savagery to the light of faith and science, reply, 'None.'"

Among the Workers

—AT A SERVICE for old folks, given by the Lemon Hill Association, Philadelphia, recently, about 2,000 aged men and women—some of them over the century mark—attended. Old-fashioned hymns were sung in quavering voices and many fervent prayers were offered. Rev. James B. Ely preached a sermon suited to the occasion, and flowers were distributed to all of the old ladies.

—THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH of Cambridge, Mass. (Dr. J. L. Campbell, pastor), has had one of the strongest years in its spiritual history. As a result of a series of special meetings in January, conducted by the pastor himself, over two hundred took a stand for Christ. The congregations and prayer meetings have been the largest in the history of the church. Open air meetings are held by the young people from the steps of the church an hour prior to the regular service, every Sunday evening from June till October. In addition to a week-night Bible class for the young people, Dr. Campbell, during the past winter, has had a large Sunday class of Harvard and Radcliffe students.

—THE FOURTH annual Bible Conference at Montrose, Pa., under the leadership of the Rev. Dr. R. A. Torrey closed recently, and reports the largest attendance in its history. Thirty-five tents on the beautiful grounds were filled to overflowing. The speakers were Dr. Torrey, Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Dr. James M. Gray and Dr. William Evans of the Moody Bible Institute, Rev. George Guille, pastor First Presbyterian Church, Augusta, Ga.; Dr. R. A. Hadden, of the Los Angeles Bible Institute; George G. Mahy, Secretary Presbyterian Evangelistic Committee; Rev. J. Stuart Holden of London, England; Dr. John MacInnis, of Halifax; Dr. W. J. Erdman and Dr. R. C. McKim.

—THE SPLENDID SUCCESS evidenced by the series of services conducted by Dr. F. E. Oliver in a great tabernacle on the south side of Cleveland, O., led to a second of a similar nature on the east side of the city, where twenty-four churches united. Dr. Oliver had not had sufficient time for a rest since the first campaign, and, being weary, wired Mr. M. B. Williams to come and assist as much as possible. One pastor, who has lived in Cleveland for forty years, and speaks tenderly of all revivals held in Cleveland during that time, including the Moody campaign of 1879, says there has never been anything like this work for depth and breadth of results in all these forty years. He received about two hundred and fifty new members into his own church. The five thousand new members are being distributed among nearly two hundred of Cleveland's churches, and all of the pastors testify with great eagerness to the improvement in the spiritual life of the church.

Westinghouse Quality and the Best Way Ever Devised for Making Coffee in this

Electric Percolator

THE very latest thing in coffee makers is the Westinghouse Electric Coffee Percolator. It has just been placed on the market. It is so clean, so quick in action and so easy to work that the good coffee seems to be made as if by magic.

The percolator is made with the Westinghouse economical internal heating arrangement. The work must be done before any heat can escape.

Every coffee lover and up-to-date woman should arrange to see the Westinghouse Electric Percolator at once. There is nothing else on the market in its class.

If you would like your favorite department store to send you one, write us, giving name of the store. We will attend to the matter immediately. Any good electrical dealer or your lighting company can get it for you.

There is an equally good Westinghouse electric device for every household purpose. These devices are practical. They are high grade. That is what the Westinghouse name stands for on anything electrical.

Address your letter about household devices to "Westinghouse, Household Dept. X, East Pittsburgh."

Do you know what electric lamp you are using? This is an important matter. The Westinghouse Wire Type Tungsten stands all the strain of everyday use and gives you three times the light for the same amount you are now paying. Rugged construction! A better light! Any good dealer can furnish them.

GOD-GIVEN FREEDOM*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

IN ORDER to get into the spirit of this lesson about the return of the Jews from captivity in Babylon to their beloved Jerusalem, we should read again the lesson we had on August 27, almost two months ago, about the Jews being taken into captivity by King Nebuchadnezer (see Jeremiah, chapters 39 and 52). Thus there they punished for their sins of idolatry, Sabbath breaking and drunkenness.

That we may learn how grieved they were over their changed condition from freemen to captives, let us read Ps. 137. "By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down; yea, we wept when we remembered Zion." But of their grief came repentance; and after seventy years of discipline God judged that they could be trusted with freedom, so he opened the way for their return from captivity. This he did first by forgiving them. "Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned; for she hath received of the Lord's hand double for all her sins." Surely not double punishment, as some of us have been taught, and thus given an idea that God is revengeful instead of forgiving. Let us understand exactly what the "double" was, that we may see God in the right light.

It is an Oriental custom when a debt is incurred to write out the transaction in a sort of note, and then to tear the note in two in a jagged line, one part being given to the debtor, and the other retained by the creditor, the creditor's part being called the "double." When the debtor is able to pay, he brings his piece of paper, and it is seen by testing that it exactly fits into the part held by the creditor, which is then passed over as a receipt to the man who has paid his debt. In Babylon the Jews received from God the double for all their sins, not in the form of a paper, but in the assurance that their sins were fully forgiven. The "double" was conveyed through King Cyrus of Persia. We might wonder why God did not choose the wise and faithful prophet Daniel, who in his old age was still a trusted counselor at the king's court. If we read Isaiah, chapter 45, we shall discover in this the secret of the Lord; that he would open the eyes of the heathen king to recognize him as the true God. Almost two hundred years before, God had told through his prophet Isaiah how he should make King Cyrus the deliverer of his people from captivity (Isa. 44: 28; 45: 1-7), and that was not far from one hundred and fifty years before Cyrus was born!

How did Cyrus, being a Persian, come to be king in Babylon? It was through conquest; the Medes and Persians were the Babylonians of B.C. 538. It was in that year King Cyrus issued an edict permitting the Jews to return to Jerusalem, "that they might build a house for their God." It was more than "permission," for in the edict he said: "The God in heaven hath charged me to build him a house in Jerusalem." "I girded thee, thou hast not known me," said the Lord of King Cyrus (Isa. 45: 5). King Cyrus entered most heartily into the plan, even with the zeal that would have done credit to a "Hebrew of the Hebrews." He appealed to the people who were not going, to help the expedition by gifts of silver, gold, clothing and beasts of burden, and in addition suggested that free-will offerings be made to help in the building of the Lord's house. The response was most generous. More than this, King Cyrus ordered that all of the gold and silver basins, cups, etc., that King Nebuchadnezzar had taken from God's house before he burned it down, should be brought and returned to the Jews, that they might carry them back and put them in the new temple. When these were counted there were five thousand and four hundred of them. (They are not all mentioned in the list given in the Bible chapter we are studying to-day.) King Cyrus might have kept all of them, and made himself far richer, but he would not. God was "girding" him, and inclining him to do what was upright and honorable. The procession started, forty and two thousand three hundred and three score: 42,360 (men). It is thought if the women and children had also been counted there must have been about two hundred thousand in all. But many more Jews were left in Babylon than those who went out; some of them were too old to undertake the long journey, and the hard work of building! Some, alas! were not as loyal and true to God as they should have been, and yet others had been born in Babylon and they thought they would be happier there than in Jerusalem.

The Call to Repentance

First, God calls us all to repentance, for we are all wrongdoers, sinners in his sight. A clergyman once stopped to see one of his poor parishioners. She had just hung out some clothes on the line. She invited him to have a cup of tea. While he was drinking it, a snowstorm began, which soon made everything white, and the clergyman said: "Your washing does not look quite as clean as it did." "Ah," she replied, "the washing is right enough, but what can stand against God Almighty's white?" "Ah," said the clergyman, "that is how what we call our goodness compares with God's righteousness." So it is that those who have never seen God (with the soul) think themselves altogether pure and good. It is not a mean, but a noble thing to confess a fault, whether to God or man. It is the very mark of high character to be quick with apology whenever anything has gone wrong, while small souls hesitate to confess a fault, and so increase it.

Second, Success through Obedience. Two drunken sailors had to cross a Scotch lake at night. They leaped into the boat, and pulled away at the oars with all their might; they pulled and pulled, and wondered that they did not reach the shore. In their maudlin state, they thought that the tide was against them, and so in a wild fashion, they took spells at pulling, but no shore did they reach. Great was their astonishment, for the lake was narrow, and a quarter of an hour should have seen them at the opposite beach. "Surely," they said, "the boat is bewitched." The night wore on, and the morning light explained the mystery to their soberer eyes. "Why, Sandy, mon, we never pulled up the anchor." Just so, and tug as they might, they labored in vain.

God had to send the Jews to Babylon to find out that being bound to idols was not the way to be strong and great. They learned the lesson well. So let us learn that we will have success in life when we try to push our little lifeboat in the currents that he has so well marked out for us in the Bible; to love his law, and serve him always.

Third, A God who loves to forgive. Some one has said: "The Old Testament is full of the record of God's forbearances and forgiveness. The New Testament is the will of God sealed in the blood of his Son for the remission of sins." This thought

*The International Sunday School Lesson for October 15, 1911. The Return from Captivity. Ezra 1: 1-11. GOLDEN TEXT: "He retaineth not his anger forever, because he delighteth in mercy." Micah 7: 18.

What Hast Thou in Which to Glory?

HAST thou longed for gold and silver
At thy feet in mountain laid?
Or for wisdom even greater Than King Solomon displayed?

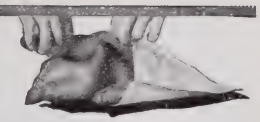
Hast thou dreamed of worldly power—
Multitudes adoring thee?
All these things shall quickly vanish
Like the bubbles of the sea.

For I deem that no ambition
Is of real and lasting worth
That is born of other motive
Than the betterment of earth.

Can thy gold and silver save thee
From the course that others go,
When the evening shadows gather,
When the tide is ebbing low?

Are thy garments free from canker
And the mildew of the grave?
Hast thou seen the stars created?
Is eternity thy slave?

Can thy gilded dream of power
Give thy spirit peace at last,
When thy dust has gone to mingle
With the dust of ages past?



What hast thou in which to glory,
Since thy life is but a span?
What hast thou in which to glory,
O thou vain and foolish man?

A Veritable Children's Paradise

ON August 19 I visited Mont-Lawn. As I had read so much about it, I was anxious to see THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Summer Home for the children and can honestly say that my expectations were more than realized when I saw the beautiful and healthful place. It is indeed the Children's Paradise. Although a total stranger, I was warmly welcomed by Miss Goering, the matron, and shown about by one of her assistants or teachers. Altogether I spent a most delightful and agreeable day. THEO. LIECTY.

"Parcels Post" in Operation!

Lower Your Cost of Living

There is positive economy in buying from us anything that we show in our catalog. This you will find especially to your advantage when you consider the quality, as well as price.

Every widely successful selling system is the development of an idea! Ours is one of these. It results from the agitation for a U.S. Parcels Post, similar to the Parcels Post abroad, which permits all sorts of things, even live animals and human beings to be forwarded and delivered under the regulations of the Post Office for the required number of postage stamps.

Most people do not know that we already have a Parcels Post law in operation in this country. A study of existing conditions revealed a method which provided for our ingenious system of conducting a vast direct-to-consumer-business at great economy, under the regulations of the United States Post Office as they now stand.

By selecting articles on which merchants usually expect a very liberal profit and which are not too weighty to send by Parcels Post; we are able to offer these goods at very low prices, insuring a positive saving on each and every purchase you make through us.

Our prices are lower than your local stores, and include Postage or Express charges paid by us.

Not only do we pay the transportation charges but, through the Home Insurance Co. of New York, we insure the safe delivery of all goods sent by mail amounting to $2.00 or more. In that way, you have the benefit of cheap transportation by Parcels Post made safe by mail insurance.

Another great advantage is our "direct-dealing system." You are really ordering direct from manufacturers through us and thus there is eliminated the intermediate profits that have to be paid by the consumer who buys through the ordinary channels of trade.

You can rely on quality in judging our illustrations and you may depend upon it that the goods are even better and more attractive than the illustrations and descriptions indicate. We positively guarantee to please you.

If you are not entirely satisfied you may return the goods and we will cheerfully and immediately refund your money. Look over this catalog carefully. Nearly all the questions that you would want to ask have already been answered in the catalog, but if there are still questions that you wish to ask, your letters will be given prompt and courteous attention.

Rhyme Practice in Schools

THE teachers of English have discovered that rhyming calls forth great mental activity, promotes acquaintance with beautiful words, and makes generally for the development of literary taste and judgment. In a certain Western school, the pupils have been writing sonnets, and one has been submitted to us. Probably few others were as good as this.

A School-Girl's Sonnet

Poets, they said of old, are born, not made;
And yet our teachers fain would try and see
If any can be made from you and me,
Wherefore we have beyond our depth essayed.
But if our thoughts are once in words betrayed
What follies will there in the utterance be;
Nor can we from their baneful influence flee
If they are to the public's eye displayed.
The freshness of the opening buds of spring
No longer can delight our wondering eye,
Emotion must be caught and clothed in rhyme.
Pentameters we'll ever seek to swing;
Enthusiastic thought we'll cut and dry,
And lay it up 'gainst sonnet-writing time.

ADA M. PARSONS.

The author may have a great literary future before her.

Peanuts

WHEN a Brooklyn girl returned from Europe a few weeks ago she heard the whistle of the peanut man as he strolled along the street, and ran to catch him.

"Oh, how good it is to have peanuts again!" she cried. "I did miss them so in Europe."

And yet a large part of our peanuts are said to come from Africa. We cannot raise enough to supply the voracious appetite for peanuts of our great population.

Those who have visited certain parts of Virginia (which has been called the mother of Presidents and peanuts) have felt as though it would be impossible to eat up all the peanuts raised there, though the whole world should combine to do it.

And yet, such is our greed for this delectable nut that we have to eke out the native supply with importations from Africa.

Sunday School Lesson

introduces the Golden Text: "He retaineth not his anger forever, because he delighteth in mercy." Seventy years seemed like a long time for the captives in Babylon to wait for God's forgiveness, but no doubt God gave it to them as soon as they were able to receive it and profit by it. They came into Babylon a sinful nation, they went out a church—the great Jewish Church, out of which has sprung redemption for the world. But some there are, who do not see it in this light.

"Oh, mama," said Mary, coming home from Sunday School, "I am so disappointed in Jesus." "What do you mean, child?" asked the anxious mother. "Why, our teacher said to-day that Jesus was a Jew." "What did you think he was?" asked the mother. "Oh," Mary replied, "I thought he was a Presbyterian." Let us not forget that through the Jewish Church has come the Bible as well as our Saviour. Therefore let us not scorn the Jews, but try to help them see the Messiah in the fulness of his blessing. The incident in Babylon distinctly shows that God has power to move all men toward the light.

Fourth. The joy of forgiveness.

If the whole history of that day when the Jews started from Babylon back to Jerusalem had been written, and we could read it, it would be comparable with our Independence Day. The Jews had their first Independence day when they were delivered from Egypt, and set their faces toward Canaan; but the rebellious spirit that was in them made it impossible for them to enter into the Promised Land for many years. The second Independence day which God gave to them when they were delivered from Babylon was more auspicious than the first, for they had become a disciplined people. Dr. Maclaren says: "They went out (from Jerusalem) without a national knowledge of the law, and they returned with a passion for the Law which redeems the commonplaces of their life with vast sublimities."

The Independence Day of the Soul

The Bishop of Alet possessed a very happy way of expressing himself in a few words. A person who had long practised many austerities without finding any comfort or change of heart was once complaining to the Bishop. "Alas!" said he, "self-will and self-righteousness follow me everywhere; only tell me when you think I shall learn to lose self. Will it be in discipline, in study, in prayer, or in good works?" "I think," replied the Bishop, "that the place where you will lose self will be that where you will find your Saviour."

Another person pleading in behalf of uniting worldly acquaintance with religious profession, said, "Believers are called to be the salt of the earth." "Yes," replied the Bishop, and yet if salt be cast into the ocean from whence it was originally drawn, it will melt away and vanish entirely."

The Jews were not lost in Babylon, but came forth a "peculiar people," because the power of God worked out their destiny through their trials and afflictions.

"In only a moment God chastens with pain;
Joy follows on sorrow like sunshine on rain;
Then bear thou what God on thy spirit shall lay:
Be dumb; but when tempted to murmur, then pray.

Popcorn Crispettes Built This Big Business For Me

The money I earned, selling Popcorn Crispettes—a new, delicious confection—enabled me to do it.

My Popcorn Crispette Machine made me a rich man. Any other man who goes at it as I did can make a lot of money. I am just a common, everyday sort of a fellow. No reason why I should do any better than you.

Write me today. I'll tell you how I built my big business. I'll tell you just how I went about it—how you can do the same.

If you follow instructions you should make more money this fall and winter than you ever dreamed of. Somewhere in your town there is a small store—a half-store, a little nook or even a store window—where you can set up your machine and make money. You can start at home if you wish.

I stand ready to help other men to make good; men who have business hopes; who are anxious to make lots of money.

Every Time You Take in a Nickel You Make Almost Four Cents Profit

You'll have a good thing all to yourself. I furnish a secret formula for making Crispettes; it's different from anything else. So you escape competition. People buy and buy and buy Popcorn Crispettes because of the taste. They're so different—so tasty and tempting, folks want more and more of them.

In my literature I tell you all about them; about men who have made big money with the machine, and the men tell you how they did it. It's very interesting reading.

Making money isn't nearly as hard as it seems. Half of success is in making the start—the other half is nerve, judgment and a good proposition. I've got the proposition—you've got the nerve and judgment. Put the three together now and make money, as I did. At least investigate. Look into the proposition. Get my story, and the story of other men who are making money with a Long Popcorn Crispette Machine. Write to-day.

SAVE HALF THE COAL

Bluefield, Col.—I received my stove and have tried it thoroughly. I am perfectly satisfied with it. I use about one-half the coal and get about one-third more heat than I did with my old stove. I don't see how you can put the material used and the excellent workmanship on your stoves and sell them for the price you do. I could not duplicate mine in my town for $20.00. I have saved $20.00 on my stove. SAML. L. WADE, Prof. English.

Christian Herald Peace Crusade

An Ideal Agency

splendid and spirited work in e interest of Peace begun by CHRISTIAN HERALD, advocating ganization of Peace Circles in community and home, has met nprecedented response from in- nt sympathizers throughout the ry. Nevertheless more Peace s are needed. Our ambition has n until it knows no bounds. We have Peace Circles in every city, e, community, hamlet, church school, before our hope for this work shall be realized. What k of you, dear reader, is to do share and help us to spread the l of Peace.

E CHRISTIAN HERALD Peace ue is at present the most inspir- rganization of its kind in the . No more practical or ideal y for the propagation and ding of peace principles exists. e face of such evidence as this e to be wondered at, that we aim come a world agency by means of many millions of our citizens enlist as soldiers of peace in the STIAN HERALD Peace Crusade?

The Still Small Voice

e while the Peace Movement at the s of our statesmen is at present tu quo, the still, small voice pro- ing "Peace on earth, good will to was never more distinguish- Above the din and clashing of and words, in which of necessity great onward movement is in- d, all who stop to listen may the call, "Peace—Peace." The shall hear it at last, for the is in God's hands.

Schools and Sunday Schools

st as it is the undisputable right e rising generation to be in- ted in the principles and practi- aws of health, good manners, citizenship, and in the moral of justice, honesty, mercy, hu- y and brotherly love, in just so is it the duty of every teacher, her and parent to definitely in- here a little and there a little, pt upon precept, these priceless ns into the minds and hearts of children and their pupils.

gue as we will, compromise with wn better judgment ever so elo- quently, it is nevertheless the obligation of the men and women at whose hands the younger generation takes its lessons, to stand boldly against the false standards that are of necessity included in warfare and to give out fully and freely the new ideals which this practical age of internationalism demands—principles and ideals which shall be as convincingly set forth as heretofore we have proclaimed "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not bear false witness."

Are You a Minister of the Gospel?

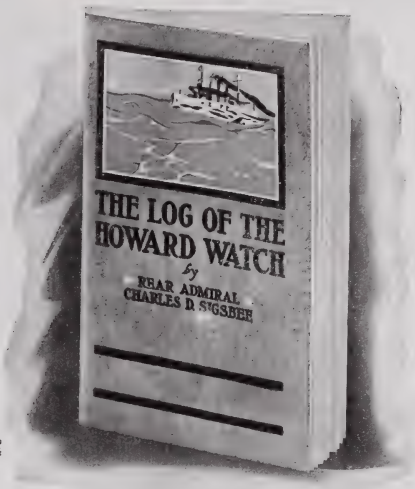
There is a vast and immediate work to be done, for which teachers, ministers and parents are largely responsible.

Are you a minister of the Gospel? Will you not from your pulpit suggest the organization of a Peace Circle in your church? Are you a teacher or parent? Will you not teach the coming patriots, business men, statesmen, citizens that from day to day are in your charge, the lessons which in their deep significance are the most important demand of the younger generation upon the older generation of to-day?

If you will undertake even your own small share of this great responsibility, and work along with us, it is all we ask.

Once again the CHRISTIAN HERALD Peace League extends a cordial invitation to all to co-operate with us.

Free of Cost



THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is prepared to supply liberally, free of cost, to all those who will undertake to instil into the hearts of school children, either directly or indirectly, the first principles of the Gospel of Peace, appropriate literature bearing especially upon this phase of the subject, and may God grant unto ministers, teachers, parents, grace to meet their duty and opportunity!

Will you not write to-day to the Secretary of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Peace League asking for Peace Leaflets and literature free?

Suggested Programme

After roll-call, officers' reports, unfinished business, reading of matter from headquarters. A brief exposition of the main topic for the week, which is "Nationalism."

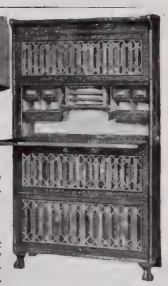
The Howard Watch

Every man and boy who takes pride in American achievement will enjoy reading "The Log of the HOWARD Watch."

It is a voluntary contribution to HOWARD literature by Rear-Admiral Sigsbee. His service, as you know, covered the whole navy history, from the middle of the Civil War.

"The Log of the HOWARD Watch" is a remarkable evidence of the fitness of the HOWARD Watch for the hardest kind of practical service.

A HOWARD Watch is always worth what you pay for it.



The price of each watch—from $40 to $150—is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD Watch. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know.

This interesting little chapter of American History is yours for the asking. Drop us a post card—Dept. W.

OUR WAY
THE NATURAL WALK

A Voice from a Past Era

MANY of us have listened with the deepest interest to the stories of some octogenarian whose memory went back into days that seemed to be historical to us. One of the most vivid memories that connects itself with early youth for several of the writer's acquaintances is that of hearing a dainty little old lady tell how in her girlhood she had accompanied her father to the barbecue which was held on the banks of a distant Canadian river when the news arrived, two months after the event, that Wellington had defeated Napoleon at Waterloo. Though the time is not so great it is with interest that one learns of the survival of one of that little army of Illinois rangers which was called into action to subdue the famous Indian chief, Black Hawk. This man, Avery Dalton of Elmwood, Ill., is now 104 years of age and is still in good health and still keen of mind and memory. One of the most interesting stories that the veteran has to tell is that of a tall raw-boned young captain who came with a company from southern Illinois. As Dalton fought side by side with this youngster, he little imagined that he should live to see that man President of the United States, the executive head of one side during a great war, and finally to see his name written upon the page of American history in a place second only to that of Washington. That young man was Abraham Lincoln.

Mr. Dalton was always very greatly attached to Lincoln and he recalls a side of his character which appeals to all who love a good story, that is, that Lincoln was possessed of an extremely keen sense of humor. Mr. Dalton tells that when Lincoln was a representative in Congress he once delivered a humorous speech in which he ridiculed the claims of a former officer for preferment on account of his military service. In the course of the speech Lincoln facetiously set himself up as a hero, claiming that while he did not kill a single Indian in the Black Hawk War, he had surpassed all in his charges upon the wild onions. In the conclusion of his speech he said he most sincerely hoped that if any of his friends should ever attempt to run him for President of the United States they would not make him ridiculous by setting up for him claims to military heroism.

"The Cloister Book"†

DR. BURRELL has provided in this book a complete Order of Services for twenty-six Sabbaths—prayers, Scripture lessons and hymns; a unique and useful book. The different elements of each service are blended with the taste and skill for which Dr. Burrell is noted; while the sermons, even though only printed, are strong with the personality of their famous author.

Workingmen's Insurance‡

EIGHT of our States have appointed official commissioners to study the subject of workingmen's insurance, and more are considering it seriously. The systems in force in Great Britain, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, France, Switzerland, Italy, Germany and Austria were thoroughly examined in the preparation of this volume, which should be of great service to our lawmakers, charity workers and workingmen.

Students and the Present Missionary Crisis. Addresses Delivered Before the Sixth International Convention of the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions, Rochester, New York, December 29, 1909, to January 2, 1910. New York: Student Volunteer Movement; $1.50. No library, especially no religious library, can afford to be without this invaluable volume. It will carry world-wide hope and cheer wherever it goes, and will furnish effective ammunition to speakers, writers and teachers.

The Religions of Eastern Asia. By Horace Grant Underwood, D.D. Macmillan Company, New York; $1.50. Six lectures in the Charles F. Deems Lectureship Foundation of New York University. They are upon Taoism, Shintoism, the Shamanism of Korea, Confucianism, Buddhism, and a comparison of these faiths with Christianity. The six lectures form an authoritative, interesting and enlightening exposition of these strange foreign beliefs, so difficult for Occidentals to comprehend.

There is nothing more fascinating to the average man or boy than

and for the man who is really handy with tools a present of one of our Combination Benches and Tool Cabinets will give him more pleasure than anything else you could select. It is a handsome oak cabinet containing 95 of the finest tools made and when open is a complete bench with vise ready for immediate use.

For one less expert, or for the boy, we suggest one of our smaller cabinets. All tools are the highest grade standard mechanics' tools arranged in convenient sets for home use. The quality is the same in all. The higher priced cabinets are larger and contain more tools.

This Christmas or this Birthday give him one of our Combination Benches and Tool Cabinets, or a smaller Tool Cabinet and a Manual Training Bench.

The Most Complete Showing of Feather Fashions Ever Made

This will be the greatest season ever known for ostrich feathers. The conspicuous use of them in every form in London during the King's coronation has increased their vogue in every country. No other hat trimming will be used half as much as original groupings of feathers. Before selecting yours, you should see the latest London designs originated by the London Feather Company.

Our catalog, "Fashions in Feathers," shows the new prime uncurled plumes; the latest styles in French and willow plumes; gorgeous birds of Paradise; pompons; ostrich and marabou edgings; and the most fashionable ideas in muffs, boas and fans.

Articles in it range from $2 to $50. Whatever amount you wish to spend, you can secure the greatest value by selecting from this book. Write for it to-day. We guarantee satisfaction and prepay expressage on cash orders.

You Can Buy Them in Your Own Town

You can secure London Plumes at London Prices from our American distributors throughout the country. These stores sell London Plumes at the catalog prices, saving their customers the regular four profits which are usually added to other plumes. A London label and sealed price tag are sewed to every genuine London Plume. Be sure you see them.

Views on Canada's Election

What the Landslide Means

From the New York Herald

THIS landslide means that, for the present at least, reciprocity between the United States and the Dominion is an impossibility. The large majority of the victors makes them independent of the nationalist members, and will enable them to carry out any programme they may decide upon. And the chief article on any programme will be the rejection of the agreements for freer trade relations between the two nations.

The result is a triumph for the protected interests of Canada, and is made possible by the failure of the agricultural element to rally to the cause that would have bettered their condition through opening the great markets of the United States to their products.

The effect of the election on the future of Canada must be watched with interest. The new government will go into office committed to a protective tariff and opposed to the naval policy of the liberals. It now remains to be seen how agricultural Canada, responsible for the defeat of reciprocity, will like the bed it has made for itself.

The Triumph of Popular Stupidity

From the New York World.

POPULAR stupidity has rarely won a more decisive victory than it gained in Canada yesterday when Reciprocity was defeated at the polls. The credit for the result must be variously apportioned. Part of it belongs to the manufacturing interests, which are highly protected in Canada as they are in the United States and resent even the slightest interference with their privilege to tax consumers. Part of it belongs to the Canadian Pacific Railroad, which is more concerned about its own dividends than about the welfare of the Canadian people. Part of it belongs to the United Empire Loyalists, who have never yet forgiven the United States for the war of the Revolution.

Part of it belongs to a super-patriotic Canadian element which foolishly feared that Reciprocity might lead to annexation and the loss of Canada's national identity. Part of it belongs to the Conservative party, which appealed to every prejudice and passion in the campaign to dislodge the Laurier Government. Part of it belongs to the American protected interests, which bitterly resisted the Reciprocity bill in Congress and helped to promote the Canadian opposition as soon as they found themselves beaten in Washington.

The time will come, we think, when intelligent Canadian opinion will regard yesterday's election as one of the greatest disasters that has ever befallen the Dominion.

The American Bogy Helped

From the New York "Times"

AGAIN the hands of the clock have been set back. Prejudice and delusion have triumphed in Canada, the best Government the Dominion has had in many years has been overthrown, and her ablest statesman has been deprived, temporarily at least, of his leadership. Large Conservative gains are reported from Manitoba and the Maritime Provinces, as well as from Quebec.

The opposition to the Reciprocity treaty with the United States, upon the ratification of which the Liberal Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier staked its existence, was partly economical, but largely sentimental, and based on false sentiment at that. The imperial pride of the people was appealed to by all sorts of political trickery, and the preposterous bogy of annexation was used effectively. Lesser political complications, however, such as the Nationalist disaffection in Quebec and the pending charges against minor officers, had their effect. The Canadian election is a triumph of reaction and ignorance.

A Missionary Murdered

NEWS has been received in New York City of the murder of Elder O. E. Davis, a missionary to the Arecuna tribe of South American Indians at the head waters of the Amazon. He denounced polygamy, and as these Indians are polygamists, they are supposed to have killed him on account of his teachings. Professor Henry E. Crampton of Columbia University, who has been exploring the region about the head waters of the Amazon for the American Museum of Natural History, brought the intelligence of this missionary tragedy. It was Professor Crampton who discovered the murder and who notified the authorities at Georgetown, British Guiana.

Dr. Crampton was on his way to Mount Roraima with an escort of British Guiana Indians and stopped at a village, a mere collection of Indian huts, called Kamaira-Wong, in Brazil. A chief and "medicine man" named Jeremiah, who seemed to be a power among the Arecuna Indians, came to meet the explorer and warned the Indians in Dr. Crampton's party not to say anything to the white man about the death of the missionary. The explorer talked with Jeremiah regarding the region, but the chief never referred to the missionary.

The explorer was not allowed to enter Jeremiah's hut. He learned, however, that Jeremiah had the boots and clothes of a white man in the hut. They had heard that the clothing had belonged to a missionary who had come into the village and had taught the people that plural marriages were wrong and must stop and that all the Indians who had more than one wife must discard all but the first.

This doctrine angered the natives greatly. The women were very angry. Some one shot the missionary with a poisoned arrow and then cut his throat. Other Indians came along and found the white man lying on the ground. They carried him to the village into Jeremiah's hut, where he died. Then they buried him under the earthen floor of the chief's hut and the chief kept his clothing. Before he died, the natives said, the missionary wrote on two pieces of paper. One of these pieces was still in the chief's hut. The other, it was said, had just found its way to Elder Boger of Mr. Davis's denomination (Seventh Day Adventists) at Georgetown. It simply said that he had been poisoned and was dying. The other letter written by the dying man is thought to have been intended for his wife, who was in Georgetown waiting for his return from the jungle. It is believed that this letter is still in Jeremiah's possession. The Indians who reported the murder were not sure whether a woman or a man had done the killing.

Elder Davis was a Westerner, about 45 years old. Before going to South America he had been a missionary in Alaska and British Columbia. A British expedition will start from Georgetown in an effort to recover the body and if possible to apprehend and punish the guilty natives.

Weak Eyes Are Obstacles to Efficiency

Self-interest prompts every employer to favor the most efficient. That's why thousands every day are cast aside or lose promotion because of failing eyesight. Suffer eyes so little from defective vision and too crowded your best work, for as the sight grows dim and begins to fail, the mind tires, the memory errs, and confusion becomes less rare.

Those who are not successful, those who lose ambition, and get an inferior position because they are handicapped by weak eyes, do not heed Nature's warnings.

Glasses Assist, But Do Not Cure

Glasses may for a while arrest the development of the complaint, but in time the eyes become weaker and weaker and serious eye disorders may follow.

Pains and aches tell us where congestion exists, where the blood circulation is impaired. All that is necessary is to supply failing eye structures with pure, rich blood, and relief will be quickly given, cures are be effected.

Ideal Sight Restorer has proved a godsend to thousands who have lost efficiency, been deprived of success, and suffered cruelly through failing vision. In more than one case it has restored the sight of persons who were hastened to be blind, gently massaging the closed eyes the Ideal tones up and regulates the optic nerves and induces free circulation of the blood, while the rare but powerful ozonic principle penetrates the tissues, restoring the eyesight to its normal condition and relieving day after day mind weariness and brain fag that lessens energy.

10-day FREE trial is offered to anyone. If you are in need of your achieve wrote to the Ideal Co., Dept. 4 134 West 63rd St., New York City, for free booklet. It is interesting and instructive and tells of many eye troubles and a real remedy. Write now.

Believing the Bible*

AMONG the many strong and beautiful texts set us for this week's reading, in the Endeavorer's Daily Companion, perhaps the most helpful is that from Romans 15: 4, 5. The Scriptures were indeed given to us that we might have "patience, comfort, . . . hope;" and that we might live "according to Christ Jesus." One might say that a whole working theory of religion is condensed into these few words. We may ponder over them for hours and still not extract all the sweetness and nourishment from them. They will indeed last us as long as we live.

To those who truly feed upon the Scriptures, and use them as God meant that we should, comes infinite patience. Think of those whom you have known who have lived nearest to God, and have most faithfully studied his word. Every one of us can testify that their patience under the woes and trials of life was wonderful; that it was a sure support and comfort to them in trouble; and that through its teachings they grew daily more and more to resemble their God, whom they surely hoped to see and serve in heaven.

Dr. Addison Ballard has lately said in the Christian Work that "the Bible shows itself a different book to as many different sorts as there are of Bible readers. If a man seek occasion for 'doubtful disputations,' he will be successful in his search; set over against him is the man who rejoices to find in the Bible strongest support, by both precept and example, of all that is noblest and best in human aspiration and life."

We who know the Bible and love it can scarcely appreciate the feelings of those who reach maturity without it, and then suddenly come upon it. A great man has said that he has sometimes wished that he might have been born in a heathen land and then have come to know the Bible as an entirely new delight.

A situation akin to this was once encountered by one of the agents in Mexico of the American Bible Society. A certain poor Mexican father had somehow obtained a copy of the Bible, and had given it to his young son to read. The pastor of the family, belonging to a sect which does not permit the general study of God's Word, took the book away, and burned it, in spite of the child's pleadings and tears. Then he cried, "My book was good. It was making me good. If you do not like my book, you are bad, and I will never go to your church."

For years thereafter, he led a reckless life. Then he chanced one evening to accompany a friend to a meeting. "There on the platform," says the agent, "was a man reading from a book. The boy listened for a moment. It was his book! Breaking away from his startled companion, he rushed up to the pulpit and cried, 'Señor, have the goodness to give me back my book. That is my book you are reading. They took it from me years ago, but it is mine. Please give it back to me.'

"The astonished preacher asked him to explain.

"'It is mine and I can prove it!' he cried, and began repeating parts he had committed to memory years before, obviously believing that this was the only book of its kind. Another copy of it was given to him and it changed his whole life. He is now an honored physician, member of an evangelical church in the city of Chihuahua, and he still believes that there is no other book in the world so good as his book."

*Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, October 15. TEXTS: Rom. 10 : 17; 15 : 4.

Farms in Golden California on half-crop-payment plan

Greater wealth is coming from California's farms than from her gold mines.

Here is an opportunity for you:

California needs more farmers. The San Joaquin Valley, on the line of the Santa Fe, has about 40,000 farms developed where there is room for nearly 400,000.

Many of the farmers who are getting rich there now are from the East. Some, perhaps, are old friends and neighbors of yours. Fill out the coupon below and let us send you the book, which contains letters from many prosperous farmers who are gathering the treasures which this wonderful valley produces so abundantly.

The San Joaquin Valley of California is the heart of that rich and fertile "Land of Sunshine." It is 250 miles long and 100 miles wide. The Santa Fe Railway extends the entire length and is anxious to see the country developed as it should be. The railway has no land to sell. The Colonization Department is merely to let people know about the opportunities for success afforded by the country.

We will tell you the truth about what people are doing in this wonderful valley. We will point out the lands for sale. We will tell you about going there. If we have not the particular information you want about the country, we will get it for you.

Successful farmers of the San Joaquin Valley say "every acre should produce one hundred dollars or more annually."

It is mostly irrigated land, and the farms are from ten to eighty acres. Many times that acreage would be necessary "back East" to yield the returns that come from these "little farms."

A little truck, some chickens, a cow or two, pigs and alfalfa, make a good living for the family until fruit and other money-making crops are matured.

Raw land is cheap. A few years of intelligent cultivation under irrigation and the wonderful crops produced make it very valuable.

Something grows all the time in the San Joaquin. Oranges, lemon, grape fruit begin to ripen in November, and one fruit follows another all winter. Small fruits ripen early in the spring. Prunes and apricots come in June and July, melons and figs from July to November. Alfalfa is cut every two or three months. It is worth $8.00 to $18.00 a ton and yields from four to seven tons an acre.

It is a fine climate to live in. Winter like June and cool nights, even in summer. Then it may be 100 degrees in the middle of the day but the air is clear and dry, and even if it is a little warm everybody wants warm weather then to ripen summer fruits.

An Extraordinary Proposition

A limited number of very desirable 40 acre farms in one of the banner counties of this wonderful valley can be secured by farmers who act quickly, on a very liberal half-crop-payment plan.

Only a small first payment is required and the balance of the price is to be met by one-half of the gross income from 35 acres until paid in full. Interest on the deferred payments is only 5 per cent.

Do you know anywhere that you could buy on more favorable terms? Or in a finer country than this San Joaquin Valley?

A special circular explains the plan in full. You had better get it and read it if you really want a farm.

We will also place your name on our list so that you receive free each month a copy of our immigration journal, "The Earth," which gives up to date information about all of the country along the Santa Fe, including the San Joaquin Valley.

Railroad fares are low now. Only $33 from Chicago to California September 15th to October 15th with proportionate rates from other points. Santa Fe tourist sleeping cars are comfortable. Berths cost only about half the usual Pullman rates. You can see the country now at small expense.

You owe it to yourself to learn of the opportunities Golden California offers farmers, so fill out the coupon now, enclose it and mail to this address:

Jane B. Marshall, Beverley, Mass. C. S. N. Graduate

Would you like to read the stories of 200 intelligent, sincere women, who became successful nurses by 6 to 12 months' study at home?

"How I Became a Nurse" is the title of a book issued in celebration of 10 years' successful correspondence training in nursing. It contains 184 pages of intensely interesting experiences by graduates of this school who studied, practiced and mastered the art of professional nursing by the C. S. N. home-study course. Thousands of our graduates, with and without previous experience, are to-day earning $10 to $25 a week.

Some Things We May Know*

A GREAT Englishman once said, "Confidence is a plant of slow growth," and as age creeps upon us that beautiful plant grows more slowly still. Phillips Brooks was wont to affirm over and over the beauty of faith. "It is the mark of a noble soul," he would say. "The noble soul bears beliefs as a tree bears fruit."

Therefore strengthen yourselves while you are young, and before time and its bitter experiences harden and dull the soul. There is no way given to acquire this strength save by the constant reading of God's word and by earnest prayer.

Many a man has said, "If I could only see Christ for myself, or see some person whom he has healed by a touch, then I could believe,—but now faith is hard." We have the glorious testimony of the apostles and the martyrs; we have seen Christ's power in the reformation of sinners; we have felt his Spirit in our own hearts. Thus we have ample ground for faith. Let it grow and blossom in our hearts, and from it every other Christian grace will develop.

"If any sincere Christian," said Cardinal Manning, in one of those bursts of spiritual eloquence which have so greatly endeared him to Christians of every creed, "cast himself with his whole will upon the Divine Presence which dwells within him, he shall be kept safe to the end. What is it that makes us unable to persevere? Is it want of strength? By no means. We have with us the strength of the Holy Spirit."

In Francis Thompson's fine poem, "The Hound of Heaven," he pictures his soul as fleeing from Christ, unwilling to yield to his charm, and to make the sacrifices which his service demands. He says:

I fled him down the nights and down the days;
I fled him down the arches of the years;
I fled him down the labyrinthine ways
Of my own mind; and in the mist of tears
I hid from him, and under running laughter.

* * * * *

Across the margent of the world I fled,
And troubled the gold gateways of the stars,
Smiting for shelter on their clanged bars;
Fretted to dulcet jars
And silvern chatter the pale ports o' the moon.

But the "following feet" came after him, however far he wandered. He sought consolation in Nature, studied her moods, and was heavy with the even

When she lit her glimmering tapers
Round the day's dead sanctities, but still the "human smart" remained unhealed.

At last, he says:

I stand amid the dust o' the mounded years,
My mangled youth lies dead beneath the heap.
My days have crackled and gone up in smoke.

* * * * *

I dimly guess what Time in mists confounds;
Yet ever and anon a trumpet sounds
From the hid battlements of Eternity.

Then he sees the kingly figure of Him who has been pursuing the desperate fugitive, while "the Voice is round him like the bursting sea," and he hears the loving assurance:

All that I took from thee I did but take,
Not for thy harms,
But just that thou mightest seek it in my arms.
All which thy child's mistake
Fancies as lost, I have stored for thee at home.
Rise, clasp my hand and come.

Thus He speaks to every one of us. Let us trust him and clasp his hand, sure of his word.

In order to quickly introduce The Housewife to a large circle of new readers, we will send it to any address, commencing with October, 1911, up to and including December, 1912, fifteen months in all, and any one book shown below for ..... Only 65 Cents

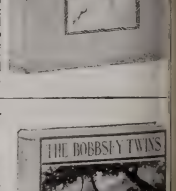
ST. ELMO
By Augusta J. Evans

St. Elmo is the greatest and most popular of American novels. The secret of its wonderful hold upon the reading public is probably due to the fact that it is a novel of intense dramatic interest and extraordinary power, united with the element of human interest; it is pervaded with a deep spiritual tone and inculcates an absorbing moral lesson. Every man, woman and child should read St. Elmo, no home should be without a copy. Colored cloth cover. 12mo. size.

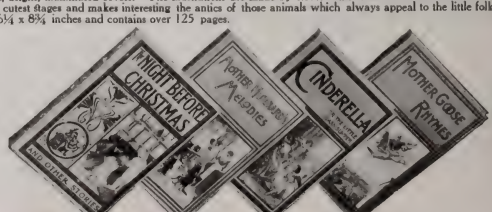
THE HIDDEN PATH

The Hidden Path, by Marion Harland, is the tale of the intricate way of life, the tale of universal experience. In this particular case, however, the young girl who followed the hidden path was led by an unfailing inner light that took her ultimately into an enlarged life of happiness. The deviations of the path brought her into contact with many who proved friends—and a few who did not—and their life histories became closely interwoven. Illustrated cloth covers. 12mo. size.



MEMOIRS OF A BABY

In these amusing memoirs Josephine Daskam Bacon has given the reflections of a baby upon the processes to which he is subjected by well-meaning parents and nurses, and his wonder at the curious habits of grown-ups. Baby Binks has become a greater favorite even than "Helen's Babies," and the efforts of the attendant court to amuse the young sovereign are intensely humorous. The Memoirs are illustrated by Miss Cory's irresistibly funny drawings. 12mo. cloth covers.



THE BOBBSEY TWINS

The Bobbsey Twins, for little men and women, by Laura Lee Hope. A book that will charm the hearts of the little ones, and of which they will never tire. Many of the adventures are comical in the extreme, and all the accidents that happen ordinarily to youthful personages happened to these many-sided little mortals. Their haps and mishaps make decidedly entertaining reading. "Bobbseys" will prove a source of keen delight. Illustrated. 12mo. Cloth covers.

Four Excellent Books for Children

Profusely illustrated, as all children's books should be, the four titles we offer herewith are the best books for children we could select. The titles are recognized children's classics. They are handsomely bound in colored cloth with beautiful, bright, illuminated covers. The illustrations are made by clever artists who understand how to depict child life in its cutest stages and makes interesting the antics of those animals which always appeal to the little folks. Each book is 6¼ x 8¾ inches and contains over 125 pages.

REMEMBER, we will send any one book shown above and The Housewife for fifteen months (October, 1911, to December, 1912 inclusive), for only 65 cents. On all orders received after November 25th the subscription will commence with January, 1912, and expire December 1912.

Please remit by Post Office Money Order or Registered Letter.

Be Sure to Buy Your Stove at Home!

GARLAND STOVES AND RANGES
The World's Best

IF you are thinking of buying a stove or range, better "look before you leap."

We, the largest makers of stoves and ranges in the world, have decided to place the stove buyers of this country in possession of certain facts on the stove and range situation which will enable every buyer to safeguard his interest in advance of making a purchase.

We take this step because we feel that we owe a duty to the public which for 40 years has favored Garland Stoves and Ranges with overwhelming evidence of its approval.

For today you will find Garland Stoves and Ranges in over 4,000,000 homes.

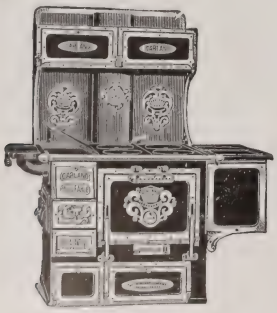
Here, in brief, are the facts:

The trademark name, "Garland," on a stove or range, because of the quality and service which it represents, has become enormously valuable to us. We estimate its value at millions of dollars. Behind it are 40 years of study, invention, experience, skilled workmanship and conscientious effort.

In recent years some concerns selling stoves and ranges have sought to trade on our reputation by offering cheap stoves at cheap prices on the representations that such goods are "as good as Garlands." The time has come when the protection of stove buyers demands that we brand these claims as absolutely false.

The purpose of this announcement is to point out to the stove buyer the safety, convenience, satisfaction and greater economy of buying stoves and ranges from established local dealers.

Art Garland De Luxe Series



Smokeburn Garland Heater
For Coal, Coke or Wood

Pays to Buy Stoves from Your Local Dealer

It pays in satisfaction, safety, convenience and economy to buy stoves from your local dealer. His profit per stove is very small. He gives you big value for every dollar of stove money.

The idea that your home dealer makes a pocketful of money on every stove he sells is utterly ridiculous. Stoves are staple merchandise, just like sugar, coffee, salt, calico, muslin, etc. The dealer's profit on a good stove is often scarcely more than the amount of freight you would pay if you sent away for it.

Malleable Garland Six-Hole Range

Unique Garland Four-Hole Cook Stove

How the Home Dealer Helps You

If you have ever wrestled with a stove loading it at the depot, carting it home, unloading it, getting it out of the crate, putting it together, blacking it and possibly waiting a couple of weeks for replacement of broken parts before being able to use it, you will never wish to repeat the performance.

Your home dealer not only gives you more stove value for every dollar you spend, but he saves you a pile of trouble, inconvenience, delay and dissatisfaction.

He delivers your stove the day you buy it—no waiting to fill orders—no aggravating freight delays.

He delivers your stove in good shape. If the railroad company smashes up a stove, the dealer, not you, adjusts the trouble.

The same home dealer delivers your stove set up, blacked and polished—ready for business. By you there's no carting it, no setting it up, no polishing. Moreover, your local Garland dealer will give you ten times more liberal credit terms and free trial terms than anybody else in the world. And you don't have to tell him your family history, either. Are not these many advantages in home-dealing well worth considering?

Permanent Satisfaction Better Than "30 Days' Free Trial"

Thirty days or thirty weeks are no test of a stove's worth. A good stove must give permanent satisfaction. For it's too expensive and troublesome to be buying stoves every few seasons. If you buy a Garland stove, you have your local dealer at home who guarantees you permanent satisfaction; you have the excellent product of the biggest stove manufacturers in the world, who could never have become the biggest if they had not made the best and most serviceable stoves. It isn't always easy to send back a stove bought on "30 Days' Free Trial"

Investigate "Garlands" Before You Buy

In view of these great facts, we urge you in your interest to go to your local Garland dealer and look at Garland Stoves and Ranges. Get his prices and let him show you the points about these stoves which make them last longer, burn less fuel and give permanent satisfaction.

8 Books Free We publish Eight handsome Stove Books, as pictured here. They are about different kinds of Stoves, Heaters, Ranges, Cookers, Gas Ranges, Furnaces, etc. Which books would you like to have? You can have free as many as you choose.

One of these books, "The Only Safe Way to Buy Stoves and Ranges," tells the pitfalls of buying stoves away from home; discussing such subjects as, "Not Easy to Return Stoves," "The Dangers of Buying Sight Unseen," "Excess Freight in Stove Buying," "30 Days' Free Trial vs. Permanent Satisfaction," "Delayed Shipments," "Cheap Rocking Chair Premiums," etc., etc., etc. This is the first time the many disadvantages of buying stoves away from home have ever been put in book form. It is a fair, square statement of facts—interesting and valuable. We are distributing tens of thousands of them. May we send your copy at once?

Look at the names of the eight free books and then put a cross opposite the name of those wanted. (See coupon below.) Better do this today. Cold weather will soon be here and it's best to be prepared now for ice, snow and bleak weather. Address either office.

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

Sultan Mohammed V. | Turkish Cavalry on the March | Italian Scouts on Active Service | King Victor Emmanuel II.

ITALY AND TURKEY AT WAR

JUST as Europe was settling down to what seemed an era of assured peace, following the amicable conclusion of the Franco-German negotiations of the difficulties in Morocco, a quarrel between Italy and Turkey over Tripoli has developed with surprising suddenness. On September 27 Italy dispatched the first squadron of her navy with a number of transports, carrying troops to the African coast. Admiral Aubrey, who is in command, was instructed to demand the immediate surrender of the city of Tripoli as soon as the government decided upon forcible occupation. A wireless message carried him the final command on the morning of the twenty-ninth and at 2.30 war was declared. Ten years ago Italy, in return for the withdrawal of her interests from Tunis, where she possessed considerable power, obtained French recognition of her predominant rights in Tripoli. Now that France and Germany have, it is supposed, reached an agreement as to their respective rights in Morocco, the only territory available for Italy to obtain, in order to preserve her influence in the Mediterranean, is this section in North Africa. In addition to this, Italy has felt herself aggrieved by the systematic boycotting of her goods in North Africa and Asia Minor, and the treatment her subjects have received in Tripoli. On Wednesday, September 27, the Marquis di San Giuliano, Italy's minister of foreign affairs, sent the following telegram to a number of the Italian consulates in the Levant:

"The constant opposition of Turkey to all legitimate and economic activity on the part of Italians in Tripoli and Cyrene and the danger which surrounds our nationals at this moment, compel the Royal Government to take grave measures that may give rise to a conflict between Italy and Turkey. The Government has decided to solve the question of Tripoli in conformity with the interests and dignity of Italy, but in attaining that end rests its policy always upon maintaining the status quo territorially in the Balkan Peninsula and the consolidation of Turkey in Europe."

The panic which has been caused among Italian residents in Tripoli by the return of one of the bitterest foes of their country's progress has also had some influence in determining the policy of the Italian Government. This anti-Italian leader is Guzman, who was exiled from Tripoli some time ago on account of his implication in anti-foreign riots.

For several days previous to the foreign minister's statement and the declaration of war, active military and naval preparations had been carried on at the direction of the Italian Government. A number of communications had passed between the Turkish authorities at Constantinople and the Italian Government, and it was announced on September 28 that the Italian chargé d'affaires at the Sublime Porte had delivered to the Grand Vizier his country's ultimatum, which gave Turkey just twenty-four hours in which to make her decision.

Though Italy offered to pay a large indemnity in cash for the cession of Tripoli, it was not generally expected that the Turkish Government would accept such an offer. The Young Turks are a military party and their prestige, which is already waning on account of the loss of Bosnia and Herzegovina, would receive an irreparable blow by the peaceful surrender of political rights in Tripoli. Italy's claims are for political as well as commercial control, and her ultimatum to Turkey made this perfectly plain.

The embroilment of two such nations as Italy and Turkey in active hostilities at the present time may lead to a number of international complications. Great Britain has refused her assistance to both sides, but has agreed to protect foreigners resident in Turkey. The position of Germany and Austria, though not closely defined, will almost undoubtedly be for the preservation of Europe's triple alliance. Though they maintain absolute neutrality, there is no doubt that their influence will not favor Turkey. As Great Britain has undertaken to protect foreigners in Turkey, under the impending circumstances, she herself may become embroiled as the Tripolitan question brings up the relation of Christianity and Mohammedanism. It is almost an impossibility for Turkey to carry on war with any Christian nation without this religious question becoming, at least upon the Turkish side, one of the most important influences in the struggle. Religious fanaticism is sure to play an important part in this conflict. It is largely due to the fear of uncontrollable disorder which might lead to massacres, to which Turkey has in the past been no stranger, that the city of Tripoli has been almost depopulated of its foreign inhabitants. The most recent dispatches state that practically all of the other European nationalities, as well as the Italians, have left the city. From Malta and a number of other Mediterranean ports come dispatches telling of this exodus of those who wish to avoid implication in the trouble, and of the appeals for protection of the Maltese and other foreigners.

Although it is common information that Turkey is undoubtedly stronger in military forces and organization than Italy, the Turkish fleet is a negligible quantity. The number of Turkish troops in Tripoli is variously estimated as from 24,000 to 40,000, and it is believed that she can put at least 80,000 more men in the field. Italy's entire military strength, including the reservists who have already been called to the colors, will total about 85,000 or 90,000 men. Turkey's navy is limited to three or four battleships, none of which are of the most modern type, and a few smaller vessels; while Italy now has four squadrons mobilized and ready for action. The first squadron, consisting of four modern battleships of high speed and great power, three new armored cruisers, a scout, three destroyers,

THE COMING OF THE KING

TEXT: II. Peter 3:4—"Where is the promise of His coming?"

THE word here rendered "coming" is parousia, literally "a drawing near" or "being alongside." It is the technical word which was used by the sacred writers to designate the second coming of Christ. In the early Church a deep emphasis was laid upon this doctrine; and there is reason for profound regret that the edge of expectancy has been permitted to wear off.

It will be remembered that soon after the resurrection of Christ he met his disciples by appointment on a mountain in Galilee where he discoursed with them on the great truths of the Kingdom; and then, "while they beheld, he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight; and while they looked steadfastly toward heaven, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel, who said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken from you shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go." Acts 1: 6-11.

Prophecies of His Coming

That was in the year 33: and it was now the year 66. A generation had come and gone; and still the promise was unfulfilled. "Hope deferred maketh the heart sick." So it came to pass, not only that the faith of some of the disciples was shaken, but that scoffers arose, saying, "Where is the promise of his appearing?"

And now that nineteen centuries have passed, the followers of Christ are still waiting, and scoffers are still asking, "Where is the promise?" Are we to conclude that there has been some mistake? Is there really such a promise; and, if so, where is it?

First, it was spoken in terms clear and unmistakable by the angels on the Mount of Ascension: "He shall so come from heaven as ye have seen him go." This promise cannot be explained away by referring it to the influential presence of Christ. It is true that he has been the commanding figure in history since those days. The power of all the Caesars and Alexanders and Napoleons combined is not comparable with that of "him who cometh from Bozrah, with garments dyed red" in the wine-press of redeeming grace. But this does not answer the demands of the promise, "He shall so come even as ye have seen him go." It will not answer to explain it away as a reference to the miracle of Pentecost. He did, indeed, so pour out his Spirit on that memorable day that his Church was baptized with fire and power for the great campaign before it. But this was not the coming here referred to.

Nor was the prophecy fulfilled in the coming of Christ at the destruction of Jerusalem. He came then with his fan of retribution in hand to purge his threshing-floor; but this was with no such benignant glory as when he ascended into the heavens that were opened to receive him. Nor are the conditions of this promise met by the sympathetic coming of Christ referred to in his words, "I will not leave you comfortless, I will come to you." Here is a splendid truth, which is realized in the experience of every follower of Christ; but it does not exhaust the matter in hand. The parousia lies deeper yet. Still less can the promise be explained away by referring it to Christ's sustaining grace in the dying hour. He does meet us at the threshold of the Valley of the Shadow and offer his rod and staff to comfort us; but this does not cover the case. The promise given on the Mount of Ascension is that he shall come at a definite time and in a definite way; and this coming is further described in his own words: "The Son of Man shall come in the clouds of heaven in power and great glory, with the sound of a trumpet." Matthew 24: 30-31. "He shall send his angels and gather together his elect from the uttermost parts of the earth." Mark 13: 27. Such passages as these obviously refer to a personal coming, at a definite time, in the clouds of heaven, and the holy angels with him.

The "Golden Thread" in Scripture

Second, the promise in the Scriptures, running all through them like a golden thread. The first prophecy in the Old Testament is "the protevangel" at the gate of Paradise; in that prophecy there is a distinct reference to the final triumph of the Seed of Woman over the power of sin. And thenceforward there is a continuous line of prediction with respect to the parousia. It is traceable in the Levitical system of Messianic rites and ceremonies, as well as in the prophetic books.

You may read the same promise in Daniel's vision of the image with head of gold, breast of silver, thighs of brass, legs of iron and feet of clay. Babylonia, Medo-Persia, Greece, Rome; they come and go. And, behold, a stone hewn out of the mountain without hand smites the image so that iron and brass and silver and gold are reduced to dust and swept away like the chaff of the summer threshing-floor. Let Daniel himself interpret it: "The God of Heaven shall set up a Kingdom which shall never be destroyed; it shall consume all these kingdoms and shall stand forever."

If the Old Testament speaks with no uncertain sound the New Testament is clearer still. There are approximately a thousand allusions in the teaching of Christ and his Apostles to this return of the King. In the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth chapters of Matthew we have what is familiarly known as the parousia discourse of Jesus: and whatever of uncertainty there may be as to its interpretation in detail and particular, there is no room whatever for any uncertainty as to the promise which it contains of his coming to reign gloriously in this world of ours. The teaching of the Apostles is of the same tenor. Paul and Peter, James and John were all looking for his appearing in the clouds of heaven. The Book of the Revelation would be a mere dream book, a panorama of meaningless visions, if the parousia were left out of it.

The Christians of the early Church took Christ and the Apostles at their word, and awaited his coming with joyful expectancy. In trying times of persecution the hope of his appearing was their strength and support. Their customary greeting morning and night was Maranatha, "The Lord cometh!"

The Promise Read in History

Third, the promise may be read clearly in the logic of events. If the angels had delivered no message to the disciples on that mountain in Galilee; if the Scriptures had made no prediction of the parousia; it would still be forced upon us by the fact that the centuries have been moving forward in converging lines of increasing light toward one focal point. What is this "one supreme divine event to which the whole creation moves"? Call it the "Golden Age" if you will. It borrows all its lustre from the fact that Christ, coming down through the centuries, is flooding the world with light. He is coming to reign! "The tabernacle of God shall be among men and he shall dwell with them, and they shall be his people and God himself shall be their God."

The nations that were in darkness are emerging into light. It is less than sixty years since Commodore Perry opened the ports of Japan; and Japan is one of the great powers of the world to-day. It is less than forty years since Livingstone died in middle Africa; and lo, the face of Ethiopia is turned toward the rising sun! It is not a decade since the decree against foreigners was annulled in China; and, behold, "the great wall" is no more. The darkness is lifting; the nations of the earth are wheeling into line. For what? It is for wise readers of history to ask, What shall the end be?

The world has never seen a more wonderful year than the one we are living in. The Peace Palace is nearing its completion. The nations are conferring as to the wisdom of settling all disputes by arbitration. David could not build the Temple of the Lord in time of war; it must needs wait for Solomon, whose name means "Prince of Peace." When swords are beaten into plowshares and spears into pruning-hooks, it will be time to listen again for the angels' song, "Glory to God in the highest! Peace on earth and good will toward men!"

In the religious world there are three signs: First, the opening of the doors of the nations for the incoming of the Gospel. In the "Missionary Concerts" of forty years ago there were earnest prayers for the opening of the doors. No such prayer is heard to-day. The hands of all the nations are beckoning, like those of the man of Macedonia, and all people are calling, "Come over and help us!"

Second, the enlistment of volunteers. In my Seminary days it was a difficult matter to induce theological students to offer themselves for missionary service; now it is almost impossible to restrain them. The Missionary Boards are embarrassed. Only the choicest candidates are permitted to go. It is impossible to over-estimate the importance of "the Students' Volunteer Movement." There are literally thousands of young men and young women waiting to go to the regions beyond. We are reminded of the days of our Civil War when the boys in blue marched toward the thin red line, singing "We are coming, Father Abraham, a hundred thousand more!"

Third, the ingathering of souls. William Carey preached seven years in India without a sign of success; then Krishna Pal was converted. Now who shall count the converts in India? It seems but yesterday that our missionaries were permitted to enter Korea; to-day Korea is a yellow harvest-field. They are coming to Christ, "a nation in a day."

In the world of unbelief there are three signs. First, the decay of the false religions. Of all the great religions of the centuries there are only three which survive, namely, Islam, Buddhism and Christianity; and of these, as Max Muller said, "Two are moribund." The only religion on earth which lives to carry on a propaganda for light and civilization is the Religion of Christ.

Signs of Its Near Approach

Second, the silencing of open and avowed infidelity. At the beginning of the last century the air was rent with the vociferations of Thomas Paine and Voltaire and Jean Jacques Rousseau. There was not a nation in the world which did not have its brave cohort of infidels who stood forth impiously shaking their clenched fists at God. The last of the old guard were Bradlaugh in England and Ingersoll in America; and they have gone their way.

Third, the appearing of false teachers within the Church. "When the Son of Man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" The disciples were repeatedly and most earnestly warned that in the last days false teachers were to come who would deceive the very elect. They were admonished that there must first be "a falling away" before Christ could come to his own. II. Thes. 2: 3-4. In his great parousia discourse he announced that one of the signs of his coming would be "the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel the prophet, standing in the Holy Place."

If there ever was a time when "the abomination of desolation" was introduced into the Holy Place, it is surely when the integrity of the Scriptures is denied, the veracity of Christ impugned, his divine birth called in question, and every fundamental doctrine of his teaching exposed to derisive doubt. That time is now. If infidelity has ceased to fulminate its impieties outside of the Church it is largely because the same work has been undertaken by men in canonicals. The Trojan horse has been wheeled within our walls. Shall we lose heart by reason of that fact? Not at all! If a hundred millions of professing Christians were to be led away by false teachers into the wilderness of unbelief there would still be four hundred millions on earth professing the name of Jesus and presumably true to their consecration vows. And that would be twice as many Christians as there were a century ago! The great promise holds true. And, what is more, the signs indicate that its fulfilment may not be afar off. In view of these facts, what shall we say?

The Believer's Attitude

First, let us believe in the promise. For thus it is written; and thus it must be. "Be not ignorant of this one thing, beloved, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years and a thousand years as one day. He is not slack concerning his promise, as some men count slackness, but is long suffering toward us, not willing that any should perish but that all should come to repentance." II. Peter 3: 8-9. Here is the reason for his delay. It is not because he has forgotten, but because he is long suffering toward the children of men.

Second, let us be ready. "For in an hour when ye think not the Son of Man cometh." Let us watch, therefore; not as those who stand with folded hands looking out of their windows, but rather as those who, with their sleeves rolled up, are busy in God's harvest. He looks to us for a

THE BEGGAR

I SAW him groping by the door—
I watched him feel and find the door.
He knocked, yet I, as oft before,
No sound or movement made.
Full well I knew that face so pale,
And wondered wearily what tale
Could be behind the look he wore;
And yet I opened not the door,
But that he'd leave I prayed.
Anon a small voice said to me:
"Long has he tarried patiently;
You are the one he waits to see."
That's what the small voice said to me,
Said to me, said to me;
That's what my true self said to me.

With head bowed low he went away—
With saddened mien he crept away;
And through the night, and through the day,
His call in dreams I heard.
A sad voice said: "Be kind and good,
As duty says a real man should;
Think how he's been here oft before."
But still I opened not the door
Nor answered back a word.
Again the sad voice said to me:
"Ah, heed the call and thankful be
To have the Mighty call on thee."
That's what the sad voice said to me,
Said to me, said to me;
That's what an angel said to me.

Again the stranger sought my door—
He tarried at my humble door.
But even now, as oft before
I heeded not the call.
"I have a thousand eyes to see
That thou hast none;" he said to me.
"This parting thou wilt long deplore!"
With that I opened wide the door
Upon night's shadowy wall!
'Twas then a still voice said to me:
"Too late! No more his form you'll see
On earth, or in eternity!"
That's what the still voice said to me,
Said to me, said to me;
That's what the silence said to me.

Ah, still I see those searching eyes—
Those wistful and appealing eyes.
They haunt me with their pained surprise,
No matter where I go.
Full well I know that face so pale;
Full well I reason out the tale
Long buried 'neath the mask he wore
While waiting at my humble door
And calling soft and low.
Now speaks a chill night voice to me:
"Gaze up amid dim stars to see Thy vanished Opportunity!"
That's what the night voice says to me,
Says to me, says to me;
That's what the darkness says to me.

A Danish Legend

THERE is a poetical church in Denmark, built on high bluffs near the sea. Once there was a skipper in danger on the sea, and he prayed to be saved, and he made the promise to the Lord that if he were saved, he would build a church on the spot where he landed. The place is called "Stevn's Klint." So he built the church, but it was placed so near the sea that it would have fallen into the waters long ago; but, as the legend goes, every Christmas night it is moved a few feet farther towards the land. The lesson in the legend is this: If we do not every year, from year to year, move a little farther in on the solid ground of faith closer to God, we shall be swallowed up by the waves of worldliness and sin. The Danish people have built a beautiful park around the place for religious meetings and patriotic speeches. The church is now 500 years old.

helping hand, in the work which must needs be done before he shall part the heavens asunder and come down.

Thus let us renew our consecration to Christ. For the highway must be cast up for his coming: the stones of stumbling must be gathered out. There is something for us to do: and when it is done, O happy day! The heavens shall part asunder and his people shall cry, "Maranatha! Behold him!" For we shall see him with these eyes! Meanwhile, blessed are they that love his appearing. Amen: even so come, Lord Jesus. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all.

An Invitation to See

By EUGENE THWING

TURNER, the celebrated English landscape painter, whom Ruskin eulogized, was one of the greatest masters of color and one of the profoundest students of nature that ever lived. An incident is told of one of the early exhibitions of his paintings at which the artist himself was present and overheard the comments of a casual visitor. After gazing a while at the beautiful sea views and the gorgeous sunsets the critic remarked: "These are all fanciful, the product of the artist's imagination. I never could see anything in the sea or the sunset like that." Turner immediately looked at the man keenly, and said, "No, you could not see anything like that, but don't you wish you could?"

If these two men were both to look at the same time into a shallow pool by the roadside, one would see the mud and refuse lying at the bottom, the other would see the image of the heavens above. The difference is not in the things themselves but in the vision of the men who behold them.

The most wondrous regions unexplored are not in the heart of Africa, nor at the Pole, but about us on every hand. Our eyes have formed the habit of seeing things casually, familiarly, in their most obvious appearances. A tree is only a tree, a rock is a rock, and we pass by with indifference many marvelous creations, calling them commonplace. The eyes rest upon them and we are satisfied to know their outward form and color and to accept dictionary definitions as the extent of our knowledge.

Some of us need a new invitation to see. In and beyond all these common, visible things the greater realm of the unseen and unknown lies hidden. Discover its secrets and learn the real and lasting facts of life.

EYES are only obedient servants. They will see whatever the man behind the eyes may command them to see, but they lack any searching initiative. If there is no commanding will to direct them they roam aimlessly hither and yon, resting only on the most obvious and often the most uninteresting objects of the physical world. They see externals only. Their range is limited. They do not of their own accord explore new realms. They cannot, uncommanded, pierce the outer crust of things.

The narrow restrictions of life are removed only for the man or the woman who can see the unseen. "Where there is no vision the people perish." A great ship is foundering in midocean. The water rushes into the hold and into the engine room. A thousand men and women, panic-stricken, are about to be engulfed in the greedy deep. But a man with a vision has seen electric waves propagated through space with the rapidity of light from a delicate instrument on that ship and impinging upon the sensitive wires of receiving systems on other ships and on the shore. Almost before the soundless cry for succor is uttered to the winds of heaven the responses come from every quarter, and a thousand lives are saved.

POWER, position, wealth, service to humanity are for the man and for the woman who explore the known for the unknown, who search beyond the seen for the unseen. By them the waste of the world has been turned into its wealth; to them the darkness has yielded marvelous discoveries; for them the most precious opportunities have been found in the most forbidding difficulties. A boulder in the path of one man is an obstacle. To the other man who looks beyond into the unseen it is a stepping-stone. Right before many a man is some great unseen and unmeasured Niagara of power which, if he gets a true vision of it, will flash before his eyes the million electric lights in his great city of opportunity. There are modern Michelangelos to-day who can find a "David" in some block of marble which the man without a vision would discard.

EXPLORE the human lives about you and you will make the richest and most wonderful discoveries. A lifetime can be well employed in such explorations. The eye of flesh will mislead you time and again. Heed it not. Explore with the eye of the soul. Look at that dirty street gamin and see a future bishop, or judge, or senator. Treat him now with respect and consideration; help him if you can. Isn't it worth while to have a hand in the making of an American?

There is a poor wretch fallen into the gutter. "Common drunk, run him in!" grunts the unseeing policeman. Stop! Look! Listen! That is a future Jerry McAuley or Francis Murphy if you or some one with a vision will help to bring him to his true self. Isn't it worth while to carve a "David" out of that poor, rejected stone?

You, teacher, tired and irritated with your dull pupil, do not say, "There's no use trying to make him learn anything." Explore him for the unseen. A little extra patience, a little extra kindness—and a vision—may bring you to a great discovery of his one talent now hidden and unknown. A man, says Emerson, is like a bit of Labrador spar, which has no lustre as you turn it in your hand until you come to a particular angle; then it shows deep and beautiful colors.

You, husband or wife, are you seeing with a true vision the real life and possibilities of your nearest companion? Have you thought how much that life and those possibilities are affected by your view of them? Explore the unseen and discover the bonds of sympathy and appreciation, the inner character with its unrevealed depths of purpose and its heights of aspiration, and find a richer and more beautiful and tender relationship than any yet experienced. Misunderstandings are the result of faulty vision.

SNATCH away the veil from your eyes and look long and often into the realms of the unseen. It holds all that is real and permanent—all that is best worth seeing. The things that thrust themselves daily before the eyes of flesh are the things that hinder, annoy, mislead, and frighten. "Alas, my master! how shall we do?" cried Elisha's servant as he saw the horses and chariots that encompassed the city. "Open his eyes that he may see," prayed the prophet—"and behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire" before the young man's God-given vision. Look through the gloom for the beauty and sweetness which life holds richly for those who will see. Look through the clouds and the tears for the smile of a Father, and with the vision of love and faith you will surely see it. Then in the midst of perplexity and adversity you will be strong and calm. The "help of His countenance" will be real to you, because you have found in its highest degree the joy of seeing.

MOTHER LOVE

HUMAN motherhood that ponders
Mysteries of life and death
Turns in thought to thee, O Mother,
Far in ancient Nazareth,
When that mother heart of thine
Pondered o'er the Boy Divine.

Still from out the eyes of childhood
Shines the light the Christ Child brought;
By the lips of little children,
Priest and wise man still are taught;
Sayings we cannot forget
In our hearts we ponder yet.

Still the "business of the Father,"
With its call to larger life,
Leads the youth out in the conflict,
While behind his toil and strife
Mother-love, through good or ill,
Hopes and prays and ponders still.

A Generous Stranger

A FEW days ago, a stranger visited the Bowery Mission in New York. He was a quiet, unassuming man, very plainly dressed, and the clerks in the Labor Bureau thought he was a probable candidate for employment. He looked over the place and asked some questions and he stepped up to the desk, where the clerk politely asked him if there was anything he could do for him. The visitor replied in the negative and said that he had heard a good deal of the work of the Mission through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and thought highly of it, and he wished to make a donation. Putting his hand in his pocket, he drew out two $100 bills, and handed them over to the surprised clerk, for the stranger did not look like a man of means.

"I have just sold some land," said the visitor quietly, "and I thought I would turn a part of it in for the Lord's work in this mission, and here it is."

"But what name shall I put down?" asked the clerk, "in order that we may acknowledge it?"

The stranger desired no publicity. He said, "No, rather let it be recorded above." And with a smile he left the office of the Mission, declining to give either name or address.

So generous a gift made with such modesty deserves to be mentioned, however. There are very many people who, like this stranger, do their good deeds by stealth, and in giving to the Lord's work, care nothing for the world's approval, but would prefer to follow the injunction of the Master: "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth."

A WOMAN'S TOUR IN BURMA

By SUSAN E. HASWELL, Moulmein

LEAVING Moulmein early one morning last December, I started on a trip up one of the large rivers to visit some of the cotton gardens. By 10 o'clock the same evening I reached the end of my water journey. It was a beautiful moonlight night, and as soon as carts were procured we started off inland. The first part of the way being in the open, the road was fairly good; but it soon merged into a jungle, and our driver was compelled to take an abandoned track, on which the ruts and holes were so many and the consequent jolting so great that we had to hold on to the sides of the carts for dear life. About one A. M. we arrived at our destination, a large teak house, roughly built, but high from the ground, light and airy and furnished with table, bedstead and chairs. After the fatiguing journey I was glad of the comfort of a bed. Next morning we drove out to the cotton garden, which we reached about noon. On the way out I had opportunity for a talk with an old man who is the pioneer of cotton cultivation in this section. He told me that since his first talk with me, somewhat over a year ago, he had never once joined in idol or devil worship; that he had read the books I had given him, and that he had begun to pray to the eternal God. "I am going to be baptized," he exclaimed. "I have told my children so, but I want my wife, the mother of my children, to join me. I am waiting for her."

Arrived at the garden, the afternoon was given over to rest, writing and needlework, for the men were away, and not a woman nor child could speak a word of Burmese. In the evening my host came in and sat down by me. I inquired concerning himself. "Ma-ma" (sister), he replied, "I don't know. From my boyhood up I have felt that Christianity was the only true religion. I refused to marry until the young woman promised to attend chapel services and become a Christian. Our children are sent to the Mission School, and both my wife and oldest boy have been baptized. I have built a chapel and I myself support an evangelist to preach and teach in the village. Yet through all these years, though I have again and again come up to the gates of salvation, looked in, and longed to enter, I have always drawn back without doing so. Sometimes the thought of the future overwhelms me, and I am afraid, much afraid; then again there are times when I am utterly without fear or feeling." I asked him if he were doing anything he knew that a Christian ought not to do, and which was holding him back. He looked me square in the face as he said: "No, ma-ma, there is not one thing. I am straight in all my dealings." His sincerity appealed to me. Looking earnestly at me, he ejaculated, "Ma-ma, I wish you would pray for me."

I pass on his request to the Lord's remembrancers in Christian lands. Do pray for this man, till the victory over sin, Satan, and self is gained.

My next journey was in early January. We had a short cart ride of two or three miles, then were ferried across the Salween in a small dugout or canoe, in which we had to hold our breath almost, lest we upset our craft.

The first house I entered proved, to my utter surprise, to be the home of some old Amherst friends, Mohammedans. The woman of the house was in my school at Amherst for years. "Oh, Mama, I am glad to see you!" she exclaimed as she caught sight of me.

She and her husband prevailed on me to stop at their house, which was a fine teak bungalow, built in almost European style. They gave me their own cart and oxen, and I went on at once to visit the cotton gardens. After business was over, the men and women grouped around me under the shade of a big tree, while one woman and my companion cooked my breakfast. They were a motley crowd, Burmese, Shans, Toungthooes, Karens, Chinese, and natives of India, but all understood Burmese more or less, and for an hour I preached Christ to them, and answered their questions.

After two or three business calls in the town I went back to my Amherst friends. They had killed and cooked a fowl for me, and gave me a fine dinner in English style and an excellent cup of tea. On my return I found the only Christian in the town waiting for me. I did not know that there was even one there. He had but lately come there to live with a married son, who was not a Christian. He was over eighty years of age and very feeble. "I can do nothing now, except to tell the people of Christ. I do that as visitors come to the house." He was glad to see a familiar face and to be strengthened by Christian fellowship. After he had left, I had a long talk with my host, who is one of the most intellectual natives I have ever met. He has quite a library of English books, and is very anxious to help in developing new industries among the natives, and has opened a reading room and keeps it supplied with native newspapers for any who will read them.

On a recent trip by boat we were greatly hindered by the heavy fog. There was a cold wind blowing and, as I was thoroughly chilled, I went to the afterpart on the upper deck to where a Mohammedan woman kept a refreshment stall, and where a good cup of hot tea could be had for one cent. While I was enjoying my tea, a crowd gathered. A very dissipated looking Mohammedan asked me in a rude way if I had not got a tract for him. He had a number of young fellows with him who were ready to join the laugh at my expense. I told him yes, that I had one that would be a great blessing to him, if he would heed its teachings, and handed him one on the evils of intemperance. The young fellows snickered and it nettled him. "I don't drink, I only smoke opium. What's the harm of that?" he asked. I told him that opium always, so far as my observation went, affected the eyesight very badly. "How is that—what do you mean?" "Only that opium-smokers, as a rule, are unable to distinguish other people's property from their own." What a shout of laughter went up at that! "Oh, well, I'll give up the opium and take to the drink." "That will not help you, for God's Word says that no drunkard shall inherit eternal life." The word went home to more than one, and the jesting, teasing spirit was conquered.

On my last journey in Moulmein district, some wealthy Burmese women from Rangoon spread rich rugs on the floor by my chair, and soon became very interested in a baby mitten I was knitting. The clerk of the launch brought me a cup of hot tea, and these women begged me to accept some native cakes which they had bought, and we were soon on very friendly terms. But the moment I spoke of Christ, everything was changed; and the one who seemed the leader of the party said, "If the eternal God is truly the Creator and Lord of all, why has he made some rich and some poor; some well-shapen and some deformed? It is unjust." I told her that it was not for us to arraign God; that he made no mistakes, and by and by if we trusted him, he would show us the why and wherefore of many of the things that seemed strange and hard to us now.

There was quiet as I ceased speaking, though every inch of standing room was occupied by those who had gathered to listen.

"The fields are white already to the harvest." "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few. Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth laborers into his field."

PHILADELPHIA'S GREAT SUNDAY SCHOOL RALLY

ON September 23 in eleven different sections of Philadelphia the children and teachers of the organized Sunday Schools held parades and rallies at reviewing stands. More than one hundred thousand people took part in the demonstration, which was the largest of the kind ever seen in that section of the country.

Bands blared out the stirring notes of hymns sung by the militant throng, little children too young to walk crowded into omnibuses and wagons, and their playmates and friends, from five years up to the years of discretion, walked in the parades in every part of the city. More than four hundred churches and missions were represented by their scholars and instructors.

Men and women prominent in Sunday School work, both in this city and in other lands, made addresses at the reviewing stands, which were erected in public squares or parks.

Beginning the demonstration was a meeting in the reception room of the Mayor's office at City Hall. There a hundred workers, many of them visitors from other cities and a few from the Orient, assembled at 1:30 o'clock to listen to talks on their work and to meet the chief executive of the city. The Rev. Dr. Floyd W. Tomkins, rector of Holy Trinity Church, presided.

The demonstration was held under the direction of the Philadelphia County Sunday School Association, of which Dr. Frank Lange, the founder of the plan, is general secretary. At the head of each sectional parade banners waved in the wind, bearing a red cross and the motto "In this sign we conquer." On wagons and signs displayed throughout the city were such sentiments as "A Sunday School wagon is better than a patrol wagon," and "We are for Christ."

Boy Scouts were in line and helped the police in maintaining order. Large Bibles were carried, open on cushions, by quartets of boys in some sections, and others, dressed in bunting and paper caps, proudly carried American flags. Everywhere the most intense interest was shown in the parades.

RECRUITS FOR THE MISSION FIELD

NEVER in all the Christian history of the world was there so much missionary fervor as there is at the present time, and never were the gifts of missionary societies so large as now. The proffer at missions is being silenced. Each new company of workers going forth in the high spirit of conquest, carries with it the prayers of those they leave behind.

This was surely true of the band of forty-two missionaries sailing from Boston on the third Friday in September. When the good ship Bohemian pulled out of her dock in East Boston, she had on board two parties of foreign missionaries. Thirty-nine were sent out by the Baptist Missionary Society and were bound to points in India. Three were sent out by the American Board and were bound for Turkey. A number of farewell receptions had been held for the missionaries during the week in Boston, the Women's Baptist Social Union tendering them a very large reception. Many members of that organization were at the wharf to bid the missionaries adieu.

Young Missionaries Who Have Just Sailed for the Foreign Field

It is always a time of joyfulness, combined with tears, when missionaries leave their native land, some of them to return no more. The heart of the missionary is filled with joy at the prospect of service for the Master; yet the parting from home and friends and native land gives a pretty hard tug at the heart-strings. There were many tear-dimmed eyes when "God be with you till we meet again" was sung and this noble band of consecrated Christian workers started ready and eager to respond to the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us."

FIGHTING CHINA'S NATIONAL CURSE

OF ALL countries in the world, China suffers most horribly from the evils of the opium habit. Since China established commercial intercourse with Great Britain, there have been many attempts to suppress the importation of foreign opium, but it is only within the last few years that the people have realized the magnitude of opium evils and really wanted to effect their removal. The recent Anti-Opium Edict of the Imperial Government has been brought about by the desire to stamp out the habit so that the Chinese race may be regenerated, and the eagerness with which it is obeyed may be clearly and readily gathered from the good results in the anti-opium work in the different provinces. That such good results have actually gained the admiration of foreigners is a solid fact not to be contested.

The detailed report of Sir Alexander Hosie, British Consul-General at Tientsin, on the cultivation of the poppy and the production of opium in the provinces of Shansi, Shensi, Kansu, Szechuen and Yunnan, has recently been issued by the Foreign Office and shows that the Chinese Government has made sincere efforts to stop the production and use of the drug with a marked measure of success.

Sir Alexander bases his report on first hand knowledge obtained on tours through the provinces and also on reports from British residents in the districts which he could not personally visit. Of Shansi he says that the cultivation of the poppy was discontinued several years after the order was given by the Imperial Government, but that last year attempts were again made to grow it in two districts, with disastrous results to the growers. When news reached the viceroy of the province that growing had recommenced troops were sent into the two districts. The growers resisted the suppression of an industry out of which they had made their living for years, with the result that twenty were killed and the plants were uprooted.

That the Chinese outside government circles are in many ways showing their zeal to rid the country of opium is evinced by a number of pipe burnings that have taken place in the last few months. On the 24th of August they held a great burning of opium pipes at Tientsin. On that occasion the athletic field of the Tientsin Young Men's Christian Association was the scene of an immense gathering, as unique as it was interesting and of a remarkably enthusiastic character. About one thousand opium pipes and all the implements and paraphernalia of the opium smoker were burned. The gathering was held under the auspices of the Chihli [Tientsin] Provincial Anti-Opium Society, and attracted the attention of thousands of Chinese and a number of foreigners, among whom were Mr. S. S. Knabenshue, the United States Consul-General, and Mrs. Knabenshue, Baron Grote, Acting-Consul for Germany, Mr. Moriyama, representing the Japanese Anti-Opium Society, and the Rev. Edward Waite Thwing, the energetic General Secretary for China of the International Reform Bureau.

Two large pavilions were erected on the field, and within an enclosure was piled up the large collection of opium pipes and implements, most of which had every appearance of having seen much service. The distinguished visitors were received in the larger pavilion while the smaller pavilion was reserved for the Tientsin Police Band.

Speeches were delivered by the police commissioner, the vice-president of the society, and several other Chinese, all of whom denounced opium as a curse to the nation, individually and collectively.

Mr. Knabenshue, in the course of a few remarks, said opium smoking could only lead to the ruin of men and their families, and he could assure them that in their efforts to conquer the habit they had the sympathy of all good citizens of the United States.

Baron Grote, speaking in English, said he was pleased to be present, especially on an occasion that was so very important to the progress of the Chinese nation. Mr. P. Papoff, of the Russian Consulate General, said that if the Chinese wished to be a progressive nation they must give up opium.

Mr. Thwing, in the course of a rousing speech in Chinese, said that China had long been called an opium smoking country, and was in consequence looked upon as a sort of "No. 5" country, but as an opium-prohibiting country she would be a "No. 1" country. Chi Kwan Tsen, representative of the Anti-Opium Refuge, and other Chinese having spoken, the word was given to set the pile ablaze. The pipes and implements, many of which were ornamented with ivory, jade, and cloisonne, were then saturated with kerosene, and, having been ignited, were soon a mass of flames. Such events as this are an encouragement to the fighters of this national curse either on the firing-line in China or in the reserves which are working by means of legislation and trade agreements in Great Britain.

Living in the Sunshine

THERE are some good people of whom it is occasionally said, with just a little touch of sarcasm, that "religion doesn't seem to agree with them." Take our word for it, either they haven't got the right kind of religion, or they haven't got enough of it. Your real Christian is one who finds a large supply of sunshine as he goes along through life and makes the most of it. There is plenty of sadness and sorrow in the world, without spending our time and effort in searching out more to add to the general stock. It is true, we may be sad for our own sins, or we may indulge in reflections over the shortcomings of others; but there always comes a time when the sun breaks through the clouds. We may grieve over the loss of loved ones, but comfort and even joy come with the remembrance of the assurance of reunion hereafter. To wear a chronic aspect of woe over worldly affairs is evidence of poor philosophy and still poorer Christianity. If we are adopted sons and daughters of the Lord of heaven and earth, and joint heirs with his Son of the whole universe, we should be the happiest of people. It is a fine thing to trust in God and take courage!

There is still another class of very good Christian people who sometimes give themselves over to discouragement when they consider the church's outlook, the spread of wickedness, the growing invasion of the Sabbath observance, the almost universal worship of wealth and the surrender of multitudes to lives of pleasure and uselessness. Every age has had similar problems to face. Yet, in spite of all obstacles, the Word has spread mightily, and to-day it has freer course than ever before. Numerically, the ranks of the Christian army have steadily increased; millions have been added to it in every passing century. God's Word has not returned to him void. It is only because we take the shorter view, the closer range, that we perceive so clearly the things that vex and discourage us. Soon they will pass away, like their unsubstantial predecessors, and the horizon will be clear again; for it is an historical fact that none of these obstacles to the divinely ordained Gospel truth can endure. They arise, spread and flourish for a season, and then, when the Holy Spirit moves the hearts of men, or when they pass through some great furnace of trial, all the obstacles disappear. Thus, step by step, the divine purpose is being wrought out for the world. All the mountains of God are filled with light, and the higher up we travel, the brighter the sunshine, the larger the view, and the more heavenly the prospect. Come out of the valleys of depression into the sunshine.

College Morals

AN OVERDRAWN indictment usually defeats itself. Such would seem to be the fate of the sensational attack on the morals of college students recently made by a Chicago critic, Mr. R. T. Crane. There were three points emphasized in the indictment: (1) That the universities were useless as schools of morals; (2) That in certain colleges drinking had lately increased, 70 per cent. of the student freshmen being addicted to the habit in some form, and 95 per cent. of the seniors, while 15 per cent. ended in becoming irreclaimable drunkards; and (3) that a college education was therefore dangerous, if not altogether worthless. It was to be expected that some authoritative voice should answer such an indictment, and this has been done by President Schurman of Cornell University. In his annual address on September 28, he declared the charge a "libel and an outrage on a group of the ablest and most high-minded citizens of the republic." He held that it was wholly unsupported by evidence and that any one familiar with university conditions would instantly condemn the arraignment as preposterous. Mr. Schurman intimates that the students must have been "joshing" the investigator in order to make his arraignment ridiculous. While it is doubtless true that there is more or less drinking in the fraternities, President Schurman points to the fact that under existing regulations they are not permitted to take beer or liquor into the fraternity houses. It is the established rule and policy of all the colleges to exclude beer and liquor from these houses, and violations of this rule have been unsparingly condemned by the students themselves. Most fair-minded persons will require better authority and more substantial proof than that of Mr. Crane before they accept the astounding statement that so many students become "irreclaimable drunkards"—a charge which only an investigation, covering years of painstaking observation and reformatory effort, would justify.

Foolish Moths

"WHEN rogues fall out, honest men get their due." The familiar proverb would seem to have an apt illustration in the latest get-rich-quick concern, whose managers and president have just been indicted by a New York grand jury. Their victims were men and women who were attracted by the ease with which heavy dividends—so heavy as to be impossible in real business—were secured for their investments. One per cent. a week was the bait that caught people who seemed intelligent enough to know that no reliable investment could guarantee such fabulous returns. It does not seem to have occurred to them that the dividends were simply being paid out of the principal. Clever, glib-tongued selling agents worked for this particular concern and found no difficulty in catching gudgeons. Every wile known to the speculative fraternity was employed. Periodical banquets were served, to which investors were cordially invited; and these feasts are described as being so extravagant that they would have excited suspicion in any well-balanced mind. But the seductive glamor of sudden wealth was over all, and the poor fools were like moths drawn to the candle. Honored names, happy homes, good reputations, fine careers, are all sacrificed in the flame. The exposure will probably have the wholesome effect of warning people for a time against illegitimate enterprises; but human nature is weak, and cupidity is a vice inherently so strong in the average man and woman, that such schemes will always find fools to float them.

The Italo-Turkish War

A NEW international storm-centre is created by the ambition of Italy to enlarge her African sphere of influence. Fifteen years ago she suffered a disastrous repulse at the hands of the enraged Abyssinians, and she has ever since that humiliation marked the great Turkish vilayet of Tripoli as a future appanage. Geographical considerations of course weigh heavily in this case, as Tripoli lies directly south of the "heel of Italy" and of Sicily. Tripoli, in a very great section of its area, corresponds with Cyrenaica, one of the most important of Bible lands. To-day the Vilayet of Tripoli, covering an area of 400,000 square miles, is as eagerly coveted by Italy as it is ardently cherished by the patriotic Young Turks. Should this western-most province of the Ottoman Empire be torn away, the long-dreaded dismemberment of Turkey itself must inevitably follow. Albania and Crete would take advantage of the crisis to proclaim their independence. Italy has long stood behind Albania, and Greece is ready at any moment to adopt Crete. Furthermore, Macedonia only waits her time to join herself to her Grecian mother.

Of course, in diplomacy there are complicated wheels within wheels. The fate of Tripoli was decided by a secret agreement between France and Italy in 1900, afterwards communicated to the other Great Powers and not interdicted by them, according to which the former was to enjoy a free hand in Tunis, while ultimately the latter should have the reversion of Tripoli. From the beginning of the trouble, Italy, apparently resolved on war, has forced the situation. After a twenty-four-hour ultimatum, war was declared by Italy against Turkey on September 29, and orders sent to the fleet to seize Tripoli. Easily enough may the powerful Italian fleet take possession of the chief coast towns. But Italian control of the Tripolitan riviera, over 1,000 miles long, will not in any valid sense give command over the vast interior, thinly inhabited by Berbers, Moors, and Arabs, to the number of less than a million. The population is fanatically Moslem and will join fiercely with the Turks if the latter rai the signal of jehad, or holy war. The Turks have ke their garrison of about 20,000 soldiers in Trip mainly for the sake of suppressing spasmodic insu rections. The general impression is that while Ita will easily prove herself the superior power by se the land campaign may prove a difficult and pr tracted one.

The Government and the Interests

ATTORNEY-GENERAL WICKERSHAM ha promptly punctured the sensational story tha the government contemplated a hostile campaig against the business interests of the country, an that he, as head of the Department of Justice, looke forward to lodging in jail certain prominent offend ers against the Sherman anti-trust law. To proj erly enforce the Sherman law against large corpo ations involves the investigation of every concer whose business is of a character to justify the pr sumption of contravention of law. It is inevitabl that huge combinations of corporations controllin a large industry must be specially scrutinized. Or result of such an investigation might be compulsor disintegration or dissolution. Each case must stan on its own footing, and be judged by its own merit This is the Attorney-General's official view, and h adds that the government would prefer that the bus ness interests should themselves take the initiativ and conduct such reforms in their organizations a would satisfy the law and remove all question o illegality. Whether this open invitation to begi reform within the lines of the corporations will b accepted remains to be seen. It is not improbabl that some of them may undertake the task of re adjustment; but there are others that would find it complex problem to reconcile corporation principle with public expectations.

Dr. Clark's Missionary Tour

THE founder and president of the Christian Endeavor Society, the Rev. Francis E. Clark is now on his way to Europe. It is Dr. Clark's purpose to visit the Seven Churches of Asia, jour neying in the footsteps of Paul the Apostle. He will write for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a series o letters describing this wonderful journey and re cording his impressions of these sacred and historic places as they are to-day, after the lapse of s many centuries. His contributions, which will b illustrated with photographs taken specially for the series, will be rich in interest for our readers, bring ing under their observation many things that throw a fresh light on the labors and travels of the first great Christian missionary worker. To Bible students and to all who love to trace the foundation work of the Christian faith, they will be of priceless value. The series will run for several months and will be a notable addition to the other attractions of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

French Warship Destroyed

THE Liberté, one of the finest vessels in the French navy, was in the harbor of Toulon on the morning of September 25, when a fire, arting in the ammunition hold, caused explosions ich tore the great vessel apart and sunk her, de- oying one-half of her crew of 793 officers and n. The loss is estimated anywhere from 350 to 0. This appalling disaster is the worst the ench navy has ever suffered, and the black smoke the demolished ship which settled over the city is type of the thick gloom that darkened the na- n's heart. The Liberté was of 14,635 tons dis- acement, with a draught of twenty-eight feet. r horse-power was 20,565, with a speed of hteen knots. Her cost was $8,262,180. Many rsons in New York remember the visit of the stice, Verité, and Liberté, the best battleships in e French navy, at the time of the Hudson-Fulton lebration in 1909. Every warship in the harbor Toulon was damaged by the explosion. On board e Démocratie it is reported that twenty were lled and fifty wounded by flying fragments of the eck. The République, which lay close to the fatal ssel, was also damaged, and thirteen men were lled and fifteen injured on board of her. Boats at rushed from the shore at the first alarm, while tempting to assist, were overturned and the help- s perished. Fifty are issing from the Ernest enan. Ten sailors from e Suffren were going in boat to shore to play a ame of football when a ell from one of the guns the Liberté exploded nong them, killing them l. The horror of the ca- strophe, which is be- nd description, would ave been still worse had not been for the fact at 200 men were ashore leave. Captain Jaurès, ho is a brother of the ocialist deputy, was not n board. This disaster worse than that of our laine, horrible as it was, at shocked and fired the ation. In modern times nly a half dozen naval isasters in time of peace an be placed above or ear it. In 1782 the oyal George went down nd 600 were lost. In 873 the Captain, with 72 officers and men, per- shed, and in 1893 the Vic- oria was sunk by the amperdown and 358 were drowned. To these vrecks in the British navy an be added that of the eina Regente in 1895, in which 400 perished. At he present time the cause of the disaster has not been determined. The tragedy is made more hor- ible by the bare hint that it may have been caused by a plot against the government. It is to be sin- erely hoped that an investigation of the facts will set at rest any such suspicion. Had the Liberté been sunk by a foreign warship in battle, the world would have applauded the marksmanship of the vic- tors and the heroism of the vanquished, and yet the 100 precious lives would have been swept away just as certainly as in this explosion, which is univer- sally lamented. This awful tragedy emphasizes the fact that the battleship is a thing of death, a gigan- tic expression of the hate and barbarism of the past, that it is a wicked waste of money and men, which our present-day civilization and Christianity forbid. It is a matter of congratulation to patriots and Christians in every land that the time seems to be hastening of which the prophet spoke when he said:

Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. (Isa. 2:4.)

The French Battleship "Liberte" in the Hudson River on Her Visit to New York

Great Manuscript Found

By a telegram from Berlin Professor Adolf Harnack announces the discovery of a tenth-century manuscript in the Meteoron Monastery by an Athenian professor. The scroll contains the Book of Revelation to the fourteenth chapter, with a commentary which Professor Harnack thinks was written by Origen in the third century, being a "Commentary on the Apocalypse" promised by Origen in his commentary on the Gospel of St. Matthew. If the professor's opinion be correct this is one of the most important religious discoveries of modern times. Origen was one of the most celebrated of the Apostolic Fathers. He was one of the greatest scholars, most diligent Biblical students, active theologians and manly men the world ever knew, though some of his theological opinions we count unsound. By his pre-eminent ability, his liberal education, his enormously busy life in the study of the Scriptures, laying the foundation for the future church, and in living a real Christian life, he sent his fame and influence down to the end of time. He was born in Alexandria, in Egypt, in A.D. 185. Under the bitter persecution of Severus, vast numbers of Christians were brought from various places to Alexandria for slaughter. Origen's father, a splendid Bible scholar and an ideal follower of the Nazarene, was among the number. Origen, then only a lad of seventeen, pleaded for the privilege of joining his father in prison, and by public profession provoked such a fate, but his mother pleaded with him to stay and take care of her and continue the blessed work of his father. The beardless boy wrote to his father in prison, "Take heed, father, that you do not change your mind for our sake." The father refused to recant and was beheaded. Origen, his mother and six smaller children were left penniless and the boy took care of them and then took such a large share in saving the world for Christ. Origen wrote commentaries on almost all of the books of the Old and New Testaments, and the discovery that Harnack announces is likely to prove of immense importance to the modern Christian church. We instinctively catalogue Origen with the faithful fathers of olden times,

Who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens. (Heb. 11:33, 34.)

His Secret Died with Him

A business man, the senior member of an old, established firm of stained glass manufacturers, died the other day in St. John's Hospital, Long Island City. His death came as a result of the care with which he guarded his secret process of stained glass manufacturing. It was his custom to mix certain of the colors himself, not allowing any of his employees to learn them. He had an enclosure in the rear of his factory where he compounded his chemicals. He got a rush order one day during the rainy period, and after waiting two or three days he decided to mix his colors indoors. He began work in the cellar, but the pungent fumes, which were harmless in the open air, rendered him unconscious immediately, and he was taken to his home and then rushed to the hospital, but they were not able to arouse him out of his last sleep. Some arts of the centuries have been lost—have been buried with the breasts that conceived them. It is claimed that an important invention in stained glass manufacture was lost when the secret was carried by its discoverer into the other world. The manner of his taking off made it impossible for him to transmit his process to his successors, as under other circumstances he doubtless would have done. God's secrets in the realm of matter and of mind are limitless, but the greatest secret he has and the tenderest one, is love for us. Through the death of his Son he gives it to us and bids us give it to the wide world. What sweet rest and protection every soul has which enters fully into that secret!

He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. (Ps. 91:1.)

Splendid Advice to Boys

Dr. W. H. P. Faunce, president of Brown University, spoke to 1,600 boys at the Stuyvesant High School in New York City recently. He warned them against considering the accumulation of wealth as the main object in life. Among other things he said: "Not long ago a man went to a great leather merchant in the 'swamp' of lower Manhattan to induce him to subscribe to a fund to purchase certain paintings for the Metropolitan Museum. The wealthy leather man not only refused to contribute, but declared: 'You see that piece of leather on the wall? Well, I'd rather look at that piece of leather than at all the paintings ever painted.' In a New York club I met a man known from one end of the country to the other, and he said to me, gloomily: 'I consider my life a failure.' I replied that every one considered his career an astounding success. This man explained to me that he had been giving his time so exclusively to business that he had lost appreciation for the better things of life. He could not read a book with interest. He could not listen to music in patience. He could not get refreshments out of travel, nor receive pleasure from a picture." No more timely warning could be given to the boys and young men of the country. A rich man, benevolent and religious, once said to me concerning his intimate friend, who was a multi-millionaire, "He is the poorest man in this city. He has his mind on money so much that he cannot see, talk about, or enjoy anything else. I pity him." The advice of Dr. Faunce was in harmony with the injunction of the apostle:

Set your affection on things above, not on things on the earth. (Col. 3:2.)

Workingmen Identified

Every workman in the Krupp gun factory in Germany is presented with a curiously fashioned scarf pin composed of a miniature artillery shell made in platinum and set in silver. After twenty years' service he receives a second pin, modeled on the same lines and mounted in gold. The higher grades of employees wear their shells in the form of sleeve buttons. The workmen are very proud of their decoration and call it the order of the shell. This badge is worn when the men are off duty and on the Sabbath day as well as during working hours. These men are proud to wear the badge indicating their relation to the great life-destroying institution. How much more proud ought every toiler in the Christian Church to be of the Cross, the badge of suffering, of sacrifice, of duty and of salvation! That was the sentiment expressed by the apostle Paul when he said:

God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. (Gal. 6:14.)

WOMAN'S WAR FOR TEMPERANCE

MRS. HELEN D. HANFORD

MRS. CELLA VAYHINGER

MRS. S. L. W. CLARK

MRS. CORNELIA TEMPLETON HATCHER

PROHIBITION'S progress throughout the United States is to come under review at the thirty-ninth annual convention of the National Women's Christian Temperance Union, October 27 to November 1, marking the close of an unusually active year. This influential yearly assembly meets at Milwaukee, Wis., the big beer-brewing centre of a State of which about one-half the area and about 400,000 of the population are dry under local option, and where an active campaign for woman's enfranchisement is going on. In every part of the State, the W. C. T. U. organizations have taken on new life in view of the National Convention.

The great prohibition storm-centres of the year are Texas, Maine (which is claimed by the "wets" by a small majority), Indiana, New Mexico, Massachusetts, West Virginia, Wyoming, South Carolina, Missouri, Oregon, Oklahoma, Illinois, Florida, Arkansas, Kansas, and Iowa.

Texas was almost won for prohibition during this year's strenuous campaign, the majority against it having been reduced to 5,000. Seventeen prohibition senators are signers of the resolution introduced into the Texas legislature, calling for a State Constitutional Convention in March, 1913, to resubmit the State-wide prohibition question.

The greatest advance this year has been made in West Virginia, where a State-wide prohibition amendment resolution has passed both houses for ratification by the people in November, 1912. The Anti-Saloon League, the Prohibition party, and the W. C. T. U. have united in a "Ratification Federation" for the coming campaign.

The New Mexico W. C. T. U. maintained headquarters at the State capital and made great efforts to secure a prohibition clause in the new State Constitution. The Massachusetts W. C. T. U. has conducted its third annual campaign for the submission of a prohibitory amendment. "Colorado Dry in 1912" is the watchword of the White Ribboners who are busily circulating prohibitory amendment petitions. The State W. C. T. U. is active in the new Constitutional Amendment Association of Missouri, with a union of prohibition forces to make the State all "white." In Illinois and in Indiana an active prohibition campaign has been carried on by the W. C. T. U. In other States, as in Nebraska, Nevada, Maryland, Pennsylvania, etc., the women's temperance work has been directed to securing local option laws as a step towards prohibition. In several States, the ballot for women is being urged as a direct means to the same end. In California, where a great campaign is going on, the suffrage amendment will be voted on in October. The workers in Oregon, Kansas, and Wisconsin have till 1912 to conduct their campaign of education and agitation for the vote for women.

Among the special features of the year's work by the National W. C. T. U. is the work for peace and arbitration, about half a million pages of literature having been sent out by four States alone—New York, Pennsylvania, Missouri and Massachusetts—and peace petitions being widely circulated.

The movement for a national constitutional anti-polygamy amendment has been promoted in many States. Missionary work has been conducted among the Indians. A new White Shield Home for Girls has been planned at a cost of $25,000 by the West Washington State W. C. T. U. The California W. C. T. U. has built a new temperance hospital named for Frances Willard. The "Coffee Club" has been started in California as a substitute for the saloon.

The W. C. T. U. doubled its membership in Florida this year, where bribery of the lowest class of citizens by the liquor forces is said to be responsible for the defeat of the prohibition constitutional amendment by about 4,500 votes. A gain of 5,000 new members is the goal of the Washington State Union, where women as voters have made a great record, defeating a proposed prize-fight, recalling a bad mayor, etc.

Among the new enterprises of the National W. C. T. U. is an effort to secure the passage of the curfew law in all States.

Alaska has been added this year to the list of National W. C. T. U. branches, the work having as its nucleus three local unions, one at Ketchikan, another at Skagway, and the third at Seward, where the children and young people are also enrolled in the little frontier town of less than three hundred, for the abolition of the devastating liquor traffic.

Alcohol and Tobacco and Eyesight

RECENT experiments by European scientists prove that the use of alcohol and tobacco is responsible for many troubles affecting the eyes. Troubles usually begin by dimness of vision, as though the patient saw through a slight mist. In a progressive state, objects seem to be covered with a fine veil, and then outlines become difficult to distinguish. By and by vision grows unreliable, the difference between gold and silver coins cannot be quickly detected and there is a failure to differentiate between colors. Discontinuance of either alcohol or tobacco or both and a mild dietetic treatment restores normal conditions in ordinary cases. On the other hand, persistence in the drinking or smoking habit, especially in excessive cases, leads to still more serious results.

AFTER THE BATTLE IN MAINE

By LILIAN M. N. STEVENS

President W. C. T. U., Portland, Me.

THE greatest Prohibition battle the world has ever known has been fought in Maine, and undoubtedly Prohibition has won. It is universally believed that the Governor and Council will admit the corrections which should be made in the returns, and that it will be declared that the Prohibitory Amendment is retained. Under the circumstances this is a remarkable victory for Prohibition. The liquor forces of the nation combined to overthrow Prohibition in the State which longer than any other had held the law in spite of repeated attacks of the enemy.

Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens
National President W. C. T. U.

The clergy, the educators, the Grangers, the business men to a marked degree, the women and the children were arrayed on the Prohibition side of the great contest. So far as I have been able to ascertain only one minister who is now a pastor spoke from pulpit or platform or through the press against Prohibition. The anti-Prohibition side was managed by the organization department of the National Brewers' Association. Their emissaries boldly boasted that this association furnished the money and the methods used by the Anti-Prohibitionists in the campaign. Aside from flooding the State with license literature they did their work in stealthy, underhanded ways. They held no public meetings, evidently knowing that such gatherings as they could rally would be a hindrance rather than a help to their side. They widely circulated the story through their literature and in other ways that the bootleggers and keepers of blind tigers would vote for the retention of the Prohibitory Amendment. As a matter of fact, the liquor-makers and liquor-sellers outside the State and those inside the State who wish to sell liquor, worked untiringly to defeat the Prohibitory Amendment. The combined liquor forces did everything within their power for the overthrow of Prohibition.

During the campaign it has been demonstrated as never before that the question of prohibiting the liquor traffic is of world-wide importance. The great educational effect of the campaign and the result will notably hasten the coming of national prohibition. The appeals which have come to the Maine people from many countries imploring that Maine should not lower its beacon light of Prohibition were not in vain. Over land and over sea the will be great rejoicing that Maine has kept her pr hibitory law.

A Victim of Suttee

THAT the suttee (the burning of a widow aft the death of the husband) is not yet abolish in India, is made clear by an account taken from t Bombay Guardian:

A case of suttee occurred lately at a Hindu house in Calcutt and the incident, as related in the newspapers, is likely to f the flame of romance among Hindu women and to provo other suicides. The suttee, Saibalinee Dassi, was a niece of t late Mr. Romesh Chunder Dutt, and the wife of Babu Surend Nath Ghosh. Her husband had been ill for some months, a on Thursday, April 20, the medical man in charge of Surend told his wife and family that he could not possibly live for mo than half an hour. His wife hearing this dressed herself costly clothing, painted her forehead with vermillion and h feet with lac dye, as did the suttees of old, and offered pray to the domestic idol. Then she poured some Ganges water in the mouth of her unconscious husband, and on leaving hi drenched her clothes with kerosene oil and set fire to ther When her father-in-law was coming downstairs he saw Saibali enveloped in flames with her arms stretched heavenward and Geetha in her hands; before help reached her she dropped dow dead, fifteen minutes before her husband passed away. Hindu relative writes: "Respectable people of both sexes a still coming to worship the place." A great demonstratic accompanied and followed the Hindu Shradh ceremony in men ory of Saibaline Dassi, the recent Bengali sati and her husban The place where the poor woman fell was decorated as a shrir where on an improvised altar stood a picture of Krishna ar Radha, surrounded with wreaths of jessamine, while at the fo of the altar lay a mass of flowers. Amongst the crowd, a lone little boy of four or five was a pathetic figure—he was th orphaned son of the sati.

WOMAN AND THE CAMERA

"Mother and Child," by Pearl Grace Loehr

A Charming Study by Belle Johnson

A Portrait by Gertrude Kasebier

OH, WAIT just a moment; please stay as you are."

There is a click of the camera shutter, and the woman photographer looks pleased.

"I believe this will be a splendid picture of you, Miss Wells."

But Miss Wells, who has come to the fashionable studio of this woman photographer for some "coming out" pictures, expostulates, with a bit of a pout. "You have not posed me, Mrs. Cameron. I have tried posing myself before my mirror at home until I know exactly how I want my picture taken."

The woman photographer laughs.

"My dear Miss Wells," she exclaims, "from the moment you entered my studio I have been posing you. I have discovered your best lines, and watched you in every light. All the while we have been talking and laughing I have been taking your photograph on my mental plate. I pressed the bulb at just the right moment to catch you, alive, alert, interested, a bit amused. I shall be very much surprised if your picture is not better than even you had hoped," she added.

The picture is a success. It is a plate record of whims, moods, unexpected smiles, and facial expression impossible to obtain save by the unique methods of the modern art of photography which has been brought to perfection by the woman behind the camera. The woman photographer goes into the home, and snaps mothers and babies, the child at play, and the grandmother in peaceful repose by the window with her Bible and spectacles on her knee. She carries her picture machine into the open, and finds an artistic subject in the old fisherman sitting on a dock as he mends his nets, the bit of country road with a farm wagon just swinging into view, or the colonial doorway that has an atmosphere of long ago in its latch and knocker, even. She has learned that the art of photographing is a matter of moods and environment. To take a picture that will be a beautiful, true bit of portraiture, the artist must have an intuitive and psychic knowledge of her subject.

The successful authoress of the last best seller, the well known illustrator—any or all who wish to be photographed climb the stairs of a studio in front of which a small glass-covered frame bearing the name of Gertrude Kasebier is the only street sign. It has space for two or three pictures of the "talked of people"; the personages in public life, and children. Mrs. Kasebier's method is to take her subject unawares. She moves carelessly about her studio, watching her subject until she catches the light and shade in the face of the actress, the author's enthusiasm, the painter's inspiration of expression. She photographs you without apparent effort in your best pose. She will take you perched idly on the edge of a bed, or dreaming over a book, for the picture is to be typical—a character study in itself. Lines, facial contours, and unusual expressions are to be taken into account by this woman photographer, whose purpose is to make pictures that are portraits and portraits that are pictures.

"Here's a criminal," she said to herself.

Later developments showed that she was correct. She had never seen the man before, but her psychic instinct had prompted the opinion.

A few years ago, a girl who loved children went down into the crowded sections of her native town in the Middle West with a kodak, and watched the children at play in the street. When she saw a little newsboy's face shine with delight over an unexpected sale, when she discovered a small child-mother of the slums tending a baby on a curbing, or a big-eyed Italian child framed in a tenement door, she took the picture, and the results were so effective that Pearl Grace Loehr was advised to perfect herself in the mechanics of the camera. When she was fully equipped for the game, she began her work, solely for home portraiture of children and old folks.

Miss Loehr's method is to play with a child before she takes his photograph. She tells him stories, sings to him, even, until she secures just the child smile, the expression of pathos or wistfulness which she wants. Then she presses the bulb. Quite as important a part of Miss Loehr's photographic outfit as her big camera and suit case full of plates is her collection of toys; dolls, picture books, toy animals, and balls, with which she transforms a shy child face into a radiant picture of happiness. She photographs little girls playing with their dolls, children blowing dandelions, investigating a bird's nest from the top of a stone wall, and in every possible attitude illustrating a child's happy day. In addition she often paints in a background for her photographs; a pattern of flowered wall-paper, a nursery border, or a row of toys, transforming the photograph into a magazine illustration.

It isn't an easy task to photograph a row of sleepy owls, or a group of quarreling, spitting kittens who seem almost to be jumping out of the picture. Miss Belle Johnson, who has been awarded the bronze medal of the Appalachian Exposition for her animal studies, finds her greatest delight in animal portraiture. She also photographs children and animals together.

The growth of the cities and the trend of a shifting population have taken us away from the gardens and white pillared houses of New England. The Arts and Crafts Society of Old Deerfield in the work of the Allen Sisters has preserved for us the quaint colonial doorway, the girl in flowered poke bonnet and crinoline, the pair of country lovers in a dewy lane, and the hundred and one touches of that simpler life from which the cliff dwellers of the towns have drifted away. Whether it is an old Massachusetts orchard, heavy laden with spring bloom, the preacher standing in the doorway of a white meeting house; or the photograph of some far away garden, its paths fringed with spikes of larkspur and roses and sweet-william, the Allen sisters, because of their love of this half-forgotten phase of life, have stamped it with the imprint of their art. One can almost smell the apple blooms in the pictured orchard, hear the kind speech of the old parson, and walk down the scented garden lanes.

Women photographers were, at first, very few, but the list grew until these women formed a central organization, each one of the members being a woman regularly established in her profession.

AMERICA'S FIRST AERIAL POST

Uncle Sam's Mail Box at the Aerodrome

THE most interesting feature of the international aviation meet which was held at Nassau Boulevard, Long Island, from September 23 to October 2, was the first dispatch of letters by aerial post in this country. On the opening day of the meet the first bag of mail bearing the official stamp of the Government, and transported under the auspices of the Postal Department, was carried by Earl L. Ovington in a Bleriot monoplane from the aviation field to Garden City, a distance of five miles. Mr. Ovington took only one bag of mail, a sack containing about twenty-five pounds of letters and postal cards. This he held between his knees and dropped at the signal of a flagman when he was passing over Garden City. Here it was consigned to the regular mail service for transportation in the usual way.

The honor of inaugurating the service was to have fallen to Captain Paul Beck, United States Army, but when the first trip of the aeroplane mail delivery had been delayed from two o'clock until nearly four by the captain's inability to get his motor to work properly, it was decided that Mr. Ovington should make the trip for that day.

The mail service by the air route was, after that, a regular feature of the international tournament. A government branch post office, with regulation boxes and a number of clerks, was established on the field, and the department had designed a new post-mark stamp which was placed on each letter. This post-mark announces that the letter is transported by "special aerial service" from "Aerial Station No. 1, Garden City, L. I."

On Monday, Postmaster General Hitchcock was present to witness the aerial mail delivered and give the project the official sanction of the Post Office Department. The chief interest of the early part of the afternoon centred on the flight of Lieutenant T. DeWitt Milling, a fledgling aviator of less than two months' experience, who, by flying continuously for 1 hour 54 minutes 42 3-5 seconds with two soldiers of the United States Army tucked away in the spare seats of his aeroplane, captured for the United States and an American-made biplane the world's record for the longest two-passenger flight.

At 4:30 o'clock, when it was announced that Aerial Postman Ovington would leave with the day's mail, it was found that there were thirty pounds on hand, while Ovington did not care to take in his speedy monoplane more than fifteen pounds.

The Postmaster General volunteered to carry the remaining package, which was just then augmented by 100 postal cards. Captain Beck brought out his Curtiss biplane, equipped with a 75-horse-power motor, and announced that he was ready to accommodate Mr. Hitchcock as far as Mineola and return. Attorney General Wickersham walked out on the field to bid his associate Cabinet Member farewell.

"Have you made your peace with the publishers?" asked Mr. Wickersham.

"No, I haven't," Mr. Hitchcock replied, "and what is more, there is no second-class mail on this aeroplane. It costs too much to carry it this way."

The machine, upon its release, shot high up in the air and speeded directly into the path which Ovington had taken a moment before. A ribbon of vapor from the engine unraveled itself far out behind the machine and caused some uneasiness, as it was a phenomenon which had not been previously observed during the meet.

Ovington's monoplane acted as a scout car for the biplane, and headed toward the field with the biplane not far behind it. The spectators saw, during the latter part of the journey, a biplane performing the unusual feat of overhauling a monoplane. The two machines landed almost simultaneously.

The Postmaster-General has conferred upon Mr. Ovington, who has carried the mail every day fro the aerodrome to Mineola, the honor of the fir official appointment as an aerial mail carrier in t United States' service. The time is not far aw when mails from incoming transatlantic liners w be transferred by aeroplane to the New York pos office, in the opinion of the Postmaster-Genera Mr. Hitchcock declared that while there was immediate prospect of installing such service would come in the course of time.

"I am very much pleased with results of t experiment in carrying mails by aeroplane at t aviation meet at Nassau Boulevard," he said. "would seem that aeroplane mail service is pra ticable.

"The day has not yet arrived, however, when suc service can be relied upon, and, of course, its perma nent establishment will have to be delayed unt aeroplanes have been made more perfect."

All through the meet the post boxes of the new service were filled t capacity. Almost ever one who went to see th performance of the avia tors mailed a letter or card to a friend or t himself. This utilizatio of the aeroplane for th transportation of mail i the first step in the adap tion of the new inventio to the purposes of regu lar commerce.

Hundreds Perish by Flood

A FLOOD horror tha recalls the awfu Johnstown disaster oc curred at Austin, Pa September 30. One an a half miles north o Austin is located th great dam of the Bayles Pulp and Water Com pany. About 3 o'cloc on the afternoon of Sat urday the dam broke, and the wall went down wit a crash, releasing 500,000,000 gallons of water Forming a wave nearly fifty feet high, it swep through the valley in which Austin lies, leavin death and destruction behind it.

Within an hour after the break, there were 20 dead in Austin and over 1,000 homeless, while the hundreds of wrecked buildings and their content scattered along the valley for miles, represented property loss of not less than $6,000,000. Eye witnesses of the disaster say that within a few minutes after the dam broke, the water was pouring like a resistless Niagara, carrying everything before it. Men, women and children could be seen tossed up and down by the tide, and mingled with the floating wreckage. Nothing could be done toward rescuing any one until after the water had passed. After it had swept by, fire broke out in many places, adding to the horror of the situation.

Several villages in the Sinnemahoning Valley, below Austin, suffered from the flood, though in less degree. At Costello, practically every building was leveled, although only two deaths are reported there.

Relief was rushed to the homeless and destitute survivors in Austin from many points. The entire business portion of Austin is gone, nothing being left of the town, save a fringe of buildings on the hillside out of reach of the flood. The population was about 3,200. It is said that there had been gloomy forebodings about the Bayless dam and it was long suspected as a danger point. Last spring a rumor that the dam had shifted its position caused a panic in Austin. An official investigation will be made by the county authorities to fix the responsibility for the disaster.

and a mine ship is that which has opened hostilities in North Africa. The city of Tripoli was illuminated on the nights of the 27th and 28th by the searchlights of these war vessels. The second squadron, consisting of three older ships, four armored cruisers, and a scout, was ordered to the eastern end of the Mediterranean under the command of the Duca degli Abruzzi. The other two divisions of the fleet, which consist of the more antiquated vessels, are acting as reserve and for the defense of the Italian coast should Turkey take the risk of sending any of her small fleet in that direction.

Admiral Aubrey's division has established a complete blockade of the Tripolitan coast and has bombarded the city of Tripoli and compelled the Turkish garrison to evacuate the fortifications and retire into the interior. It is supposed that they will here await reinforcements, leaving the Italians in possession of the coast and the cities of Cyrene and Benghasi, which they have already seized.

A section of the fleet commanded by the Duca degli Abruzzi discovered Turkish war vessels at Prevesa, a town on the Adriatic, and after bombarding the city, destroyed a cruiser, and, it is believed, disabled a gunboat. They here captured a transport and about two hundred prisoners and a Turkish yacht. A section of the Duke's command also bombarded the port of Reschadie and so damaged a Turkish torpedo boat that it was beached and abandoned by its crew.

The latest dispatches state that there has been a battle in the Aegean Sea or the Dardanelles, in which the Italians practically destroyed the Turkish fleet, which they had chased from Beirut, though they lost two vessels themselves. The strictest censorship is being exercised over the news dispatches, and the exact details of the most recent engagement cannot be ascertained.

Our Boys and Girls

School Cliques and Bands, Sunday School Societies, Clubs, Circles and Guilds

DEAR Aunt in the Cozy Corner: We want to start a club. We re eight boys and eight girls in the ame high school grade, and we should ike to plan for some nice times to- ether this winter. Will you help us, lease?"

II.

"We should like to change our de- ightful Out-of-Door Club to an equal- y delightful In-Door Club, for the utumn and winter. Will you please elp us with plans nd suggestions?"

III.

"Some of us boys ave gotten up a Kite and Airship Society. We should ike to have you tell us where to find suggestions and plans for best box kites and latest model airships, and a good book on Air- shipping."

Letters like this are arriving in the Cozy Corner every day, for as the win- ter comes on and the evenings grow long boys and girls everywhere seem to want to form them- selves into bands and societies; or members of clubs— reading clubs, na- ture study, simple science and garden clubs, camping, cooking, and handi- craft clubs, junior guilds and sewing bands—resume their interest.

ETHEL

Painting by R. Peacock, Tate Gallery (London)

Such Good Times Together

The Junior Scientists, nine boys be- tween the ages of twelve and sixteen who have met every Saturday night for twenty-two weeks to talk over sim- ple scientific experiments which they have "tried out," write for plans for setting up a wireless telegraph appara- tus and a list of best and latest simple science books.

The village boys and girls in an in- termediate school in Airdale, Ill., have bravely started to beautify their little home town. They write for lists of bulbs and seeds to plant out in Octo- ber, so that the school yard and some rather unsightly places here and there will be covered with blossoms by Dec- oration Day.

The Wide-Awakes in the little town of Milton, Fla., are a sewing club for dolls. Already they have dressed thirty-two dolls to put into a mission box, which will be sent to Palestine at Christmas time. The president of this club writes asking for picture postal cards, magazine covers, illustrations, etc., with which they will make scrap- books for little people nearer home. And a new Sunshine Society writes for suggestions for making money easily and pleasantly in order to carry out their undertaking to buy some new books for the Sunday School library, while the Home Club, a busy society of boys and girls, desire to make their own pin-money, "and plenty of it," the writer of the letter adds, and signs herself, The Middle-Sized Sister.

Ready for You All

DEAR Cozy Corner Boys and Girls: Now the Aunt in the Cozy Corner, because she has lived among lively boys and girls for so long and loves them so dearly, is ready for you all.

Only a small number of your re- quests can be answered here, our space is so precious and so limited; but I as- sure you it is one of my greatest pleas- ures to answer each and every one of your letters personally and in the order in which they come to me.

Call a Meeting

Let as many of you as will, organ- ize clubs; little or big, and of any kind. You have only to call a meeting and appoint a member to write to the Aunt in the Cozy Corner, care of THE CHRIS- TIAN HERALD, New York City, telling the name and pur- pose of your club and the name and address of each member. You will immediately all re- ceive a letter full of plans and sugges- tions for good times together, telling you just what to do at your next meet- ing, and at other meetings besides.

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner is an active member of boys' and girls' clubs all over the world, and you may be sure she can help you plan for plenty of good times to- gether. So if you belong to a band, a Sunday School so- ciety, a good-time circle or a school clique, or if you want to get up a club of any kind, write and tell the Aunt in the Cozy Corner all about it.

After the Storm

William Makepeace Thackeray

And when, its force expended,
The harmless storm was ended,
And as the sunrise splendid
Came blushing o'er the sea,
I thought, as day was breaking,
My little girls were waking,
And smiling and making
A prayer at home for me.

Prize Offer and The October Souvenir

TO WIN a prize or to receive a truly beautiful souvenir brings a very happy moment into the life of any boy or girl. For this reason we long ago determined that Cozy Corner prizes and souvenirs should always and invariably be very beautiful.

Instead of money, which is almost certain to melt away, Cozy Corner prizes are excellent watches, best kodaks, water-color paints, fountain pens, standard books, charming pic- tures, and many other nice things be- sides. To the little folk we give prizes of toys, games, dolls, etc., pa- per dolls, pictures, story books, and ever so many nice love-up-able things, as those who have been winning our prizes constantly testify; and we are constantly reassured by boys and girls everywhere that Cozy Corner souvenirs, pictures and booklets are lovely beyond their highest expecta- tion.

Go In to Win

THESE are the reasons why we want all you boys and girls in the homes where THE CHRISTIAN HERALD goes to enter these prize contests and to go in with all your might and main to win, and to write for Cozy Corner souvenirs whenever the opportunity offers. Any one who wins a Cozy Corner prize or owns a Cozy Corner souvenir will want to keep it for ever and ever.

The Symbol of Household Liberty

Use Ivory Soap for everything—bath, toilet, in the laundry, in the kitchen.

Wash the dishes with Ivory Soap. Clean the refrigerator with it, the cut glass, the silver —everything.

Do this, and see what an improvement there is in the appearance of your home. See, too, how much better your hands look—how much better they feel. They will be as soft and white as if such things as dishpans and washtubs did not exist.

Ivory Soap . . . 99 44/100 Per Cent. Pure

A Geography Puzzle

TO ALL boys and girls under eigh- teen years of age who guess the correct names with which to fill in at least five of the blanks and paren- theses in the following puzzle, we will send a regular prize. To the first prize-winner guessing all correctly we will send a watch—not a toy, but a guaranteed watch. A dainty small one if it is a girl who wins, and a reg- ular size watch if it is a boy.

Copy This and Fill It In —— (a city in Australia) and her friend (a city in Montana) went shopping, bought a green (county in Ireland) and a beautiful (city in the northern part of California) pin. The city in Montana was dressed in a costume made of (hills in Dakota) (a plateau in Asia) cloth. The city in Australia was dressed in (moun- tains in Vermont) velvet and wore on her finger (a river in Mississippi) ring. She bought (an island in Scot- land) for a dainty dress for her sis- ter (a city in Sweden), and then they both went home, delighted with their day together.

Special Contest for Our Little People

FOR the best puzzle of any kind that boys and girls under twelve might guess we will send for a girl's first prize a new popular indoor game. Second prize, a splendid box of paints. For a boy's first prize a fountain pen. Second prize, a Blue Hill box kite. There are twenty beautiful pictures and ten paper dolls for boys and girls who shall be winning extra supple- mentary prizes in this class.

Put "October contest," your name, address and age clearly inside your letter and send it before October 20 to the Aunt in the Cozy Corner, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York City.

Our October Souvenir

THE Cozy Corner souvenir for this season is a charming picture, beautifully colored. The Aunt in the Cozy Corner will put her own auto- graph on each picture, and one shall be sent to every boy and girl who en- ters the prize contests, and to all others who write for the first time. Please enclose a stamp to cover postage.

Our Good-Night Verse

We love him, because he first loved us. . . . And this commandment have we from him, that he who loveth God love his brother also.—I. John 4 : 19, 21.

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner

WHY MAN OF TO-DAY IS ONLY 50 PER CENT. EFFICIENT

By WALTER GRIFFITH

If one were to form an opinion from the number of helpful, inspiring and informing articles one sees in the public press and magazines, the purpose of which is to increase our efficiency, he must believe that the entire American Nation is striving for such an end—

And this is so.

The American Man because the race is swifter every day: competition is keener and the stronger the man the greater his capacity to win. The stronger the man the stronger his will and brain, and the greater his ability to match wits and win. The greater his confidence in himself the greater the confidence of other people in him: the keener his wit and the clearer his brain.

The American Woman because she must be competent to rear and manage the family and home, and take all the thought and responsibility from the shoulders of the man whose present-day business burdens are all that he can carry.

Now what are we doing to secure that efficiency? Much mentally, some of us much physically, but what is the trouble?

We are not really efficient more than half the time. Half the time blue and worried—all the time nervous—some of the time really incapacitated by illness.

There is a reason for this—a practical reason, one that has been known to physician's for quite a period and will be known to the entire World ere long.

That reason is that the human system does not, and will not, rid itself of all the waste which it accumulates under our present mode of living. No matter how regular we are, the food we eat and the sedentary lives we live (even though we do get some exercise) make it impossible; just as impossible as it is for the grate of a stove to rid itself of clinkers.

And the waste does to us exactly what the clinkers do to the stove; make the fire burn low and inefficiently until enough clinkers have accumulated, and then prevent its burning at all.

It has been our habit, after this waste has reduced our efficiency about 75 per cent., to drug ourselves; or after we have become 100 per cent. inefficient through illness, to still further attempt to rid ourselves of it in the same way—by drugging.

If a clock is not cleaned once in a while it clogs up and stops; the same way with an engine because of the residue which it, itself, accumulates. To clean the clock, you would not put acid on the parts, though you could probably find one that would do the work, nor to clean the engine would you force a cleaner through it that would injure its parts; yet that is the process you employ when you drug the system to rid it of waste.

You would clean your clock and engine with a harmless cleanser that Nature has provided, and you can do exactly the same for yourself as I will demonstrate before I conclude.

The reason that a physician's first step in illness is to purge the system is that no medicine can take effect nor can the system work properly while the colon (large intestine) is clogged up. If the colon were not clogged up the chances are 10 to 1 that you would not have been ill at all.

It may take some time for the clogging process to reach the stage where it produces real illness but, no matter how long it takes, while it is going on the functions are not working so as to keep us up to "concert pitch." Our livers are sluggish, we are dull and heavy—slight or severe headaches, come on—our sleep does not rest us—in short, we are about 50 per cent. efficient.

And if this condition progresses to where real illness develops, it is impossible to tell what form that illness will take, because—

The blood is constantly circulating through the colon and, taking up by absorption the poisons in the waste which it contains, it distributes them throughout the system and weakens it so that we are subject to whatever disease is most prevalent.

The nature of the illness depends on our own little weaknesses and what we are the least able to resist.

These facts are all scientifically correct in every particular, and it has often surprised me that they are not more generally known and appreciated. All we have to do is to consider the treatment that we have received in illness to realize fully how it developed, and the methods used to remove it.

So you see that not only is accumulated waste directly and constantly pulling down our efficiency by making our blood poor and our intellect dull—our spirits low and our ambitions weak, but it is responsible through its weakening and infecting processes for a list of illnesses that if catalogued here would seem almost unbelievable.

It is the direct and immediate cause of that very expensive and dangerous complaint—appendicitis.

If we can successfully eliminate the waste all our functions work properly and in accord—there are no poisons being taken up by the blood, so it is pure and imparts strength to every part of the body instead of weakness—there is nothing to clog up the system and make us bilious, dull and nervously fearful.

With everything working in perfect accord and without obstruction, our brains are clear, our entire physical being is competent to respond quickly to every requirement, and we are 100 per cent. efficient.

Now this waste that I speak of cannot be thoroughly removed by drugs, but even if it could the effect of these drugs on the functions is very unnatural, and if continued becomes a periodical necessity.

Note the opinions on drugging of two eminent physicians:

Prof. Alonzo Clark, M. D., of the New York College of Physicians and Surgeons, says: "All of our curative agents are poisons, and as a consequence, every dose diminishes the patient's vitality."

Prof. Joseph M. Smith, M. D., of the same school, says: "All medicines which enter the circulation poison the blood in the same manner as do the poisons that produce disease."

Now, the internal organism can be kept as sweet and pure and clean as the external and by the same natural, sane method—bathing. By the proper system warm water can be introduced so that the colon is perfectly cleansed and kept pure.

There is no violence in this process—it seems to be just as normal and natural as washing one's hands.

Physicians are taking it up more widely and generally every day, and it seems as though everyone should be informed thoroughly on a practice which, though so rational and simple, is revolutionary in its accomplishments.

This is rather a delicate subject to write of exhaustively in the public press, but Chas. A. Tyrrell, M. D., has prepared an interesting treatise on "Why Man of Today Is Only 50% Efficient," which treats the subject very exhaustively, and which he will send without cost to any one addressing him at 134 West 65th Street, New York, and mentioning that they have read this article in the CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Personally, I am enthusiastic on Internal Bathing because I have seen what it has done in illness as well as in health, and I believe that every person who wishes to keep in as near a perfect condition as is humanly possible should at least be informed on this subject; he will also probably learn something about himself which he has never known through reading the little book to which I refer.

Intelligent Warfare*

PROBABLY most of us from time to time hear one and another say, "I am not interested in foreign missions."

Sometimes this remark is followed by another indicating that home missions seem to the speaker to be more important. Sometimes he or she professes interest in no missions whatever. In either case, you may be reasonably sure that the speaker does not know much of what he is talking about. "The world is so full of a number of things," as Robert Louis Stevenson says, that the wisest of us cannot comprehend them all in his knowledge; and it is surprising how many are totally ignorant upon the subject of foreign missions. It is impossible that people should be much interested in a matter of which they know little or nothing. This cause alone accounts for very much of the indifference regarding missions.

To those of us whose souls have burned within as we have read or listened to the thrilling stories of men and women who have given their lives, in the name of Christ, to the uplifting of the backward races, it has seemed incredible that any could remain untouched by those pathetic recitals, or heedless of the needs of the noble men and women who relate them.

Read John C. Lambert's Romance of Missionary Heroism; Mrs. Caroline Atwater Mason's Lux Christi and Little Green God; Bishop Neely's terrible description of the social and religious condition of South America; Blaikie's Life of David Livingstone; Miss Ellen C. Parsons' A Life for Africa; Dr. W. E. Griffis's books upon Japan and Korea; John G. Paton's Autobiography; Dr. Arthur H. Smith's and Dr. Brown's books upon China. The list might be indefinitely extended, but if anybody will read these works alone, it seems impossible that he can ever again say that he is not interested in foreign missions.

An "argument," so-called, which is often advanced against them is, "The heathen have their religion and we have ours. Let them alone."

"A man does not have to know Sanscrit," says William T. Ellis, "in order to form an opinion of Hinduism. Let him go to Benares and use his own eyes and ears—and nose. The same is true of all the other great 'ethnic faiths.' They have promoted or permitted social conditions which are utterly impossible in this twentieth century world-neighborhood."

In short, the ideals of life and humanity cherished in heathen lands are usually foul and degrading. It is these ideals which the missionaries are striving to change. Just as soon as the religion of Christ is introduced into a community, it begins to rise in the scale of civilization. Honesty, purity (a clean house and body as well as clean heart), unselfishness, love, peace—all these are what Christ's religion means; and, faulty as our own country is, and as are all of the so-called "Christian" nations, they at least possess these higher ideals.

The lamented Dr. DeForest testified during his last visit to this country that Japan had already virtually adopted Christian ideals. Polygamy still prevails there, but it is decreasing and men are becoming ashamed to own that they have more than one wife. Barbarous cruelty in the punishment of criminals is declining. Popular education is prescribed there; business methods are wholesomely improving; women are receiving better treatment—and our missionaries are chiefly responsible for this great enlightening.

Read, study, know,—and you will awaken in yourself a lively interest in foreign missions.

You Can Weigh

Exactly what You Should Weigh

You can be Strong—Vigorous—full of life and Energy.

You can be free from Chronic Ailments—every organ of your body strong as nature intended.

You can have a Good Figure—as good as any woman.

You can have a Clear Skin.

I no longer need to say what "I can do," but what "I HAVE DONE." I have helped 49,000 of the most cultured, intelligent women of America to arise to their very best—why not you?

NO DRUGS NO MEDICINES

My pupils simply comply with Nature's laws.

What My Pupils say:

"Every one notices the change in my complexion; it has lost that yellow color."

"Just think what you have done for me! Last year I weighed 216 pounds, this year 146, and have not gained an ounce back. I am not wrinkled either. I feel so young and strong, no rheumatism, or sluggish liver, and I can breathe now. It is surprising how easily I did it, I feel 15 years younger."

"Just think! I have not had a pill or a cathartic since I began, and I used to take one every night."

"My weight has increased 30 pounds. I don't know what indigestion is any more, and my nerves are so rested! I sleep like a baby."

"Miss Cocroft, I have taken off my glasses, and my catarrh is so much better. Isn't that good?

"I feel as if I could look every man, woman and child in the face with the feeling that I am reconstructed spiritually, physically and mentally. Really I am a stronger, better woman. I don't know how to tell you or to thank you."

Reports like these come to me every day. Do you wonder I want to help every woman to vibrant health and happiness? Write me your faults of health or figure. Your correspondence is held in strict confidence. If I cannot help you I will tell you what will.

My free book tells how to stand and walk correctly, and contains other information of vital interest to women. Every woman is welcome to it. Write for it. If you do not need me, you may be able to help a dear friend.

I have had a wonderful experience, and I'd like to tell you about it.

Questions and Answers

J. R. C., Potlatch, Idaho. What are the incomes of the kings of the leading countries? Also of our own richest men?

The Emperor of Austria receives yearly 3,875,000; the English King and Queen, 2,350,000, while the rest of the family are allowed $560,000 (besides an income of nearly a million more from private property); the King of Prussia, $3,846,121 (also a large private income); the Czar has had about $12,000,000, but this has been reduced by the unsettled condition of the empire. Our own rich men do not publish the statistics of their incomes, but undoubtedly there are several men in America whose incomes run up into the millions; while there must be thousands whose incomes range from $100,000 to $1,000,000.

A reader in Florida (M. C. M.) sends us this verse, which contains a beautiful thought:

"The night birds sang and the stars above
Told many a wondrous story
Of friends long passed to the kingdom of love,
Where the soul wears its mantle of glory."

B. M. G., Henry, Va. I cannot conceive how a Christian can hope for peace, only as humanity can be able to grasp the truth through faith and obedience to the Divine Master, who alone is the Prince of Peace. Can we thwart God's plan? Only temporary peace is brought about by legislation and the powers that be; permanent peace by the Power from above. "Therefore we can but render unto Caesar the things that be Caesar's and unto God the things that be God's."

"B. M. G." is entirely sound in holding that enduring world-peace can come only from God; yet men do right to strive Godward and to endeavor to carry out his will. Thus, by the preaching of the Gospel we sow the seed for the ultimate inbringing of the nations, but the harvest must come from God. We ourselves cannot command it. Peace-lovers throughout the world are but seed-sowers; they pray while they sow. They themselves may never reap; but they know that God in his own good time will send peace on the earth and they are working on the lines of the Divine plan. To believe the contrary would be to justify war in the name of Christianity.

B. M., Decatur, Ia. What States have adopted the proposed anti-polygamy amendment to the constitution?

New York, Iowa, West Virginia, Delaware, Missouri, Maine, North Dakota, New Jersey, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Minnesota, California, Washington, South Dakota, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Montana, Ohio, New Hampshire, Nebraska, Texas and Arkansas. Two-thirds of the whole number of States are necessary before Congress can take action looking to the adoption of the amendment. When it is adopted, polygamy will then have become a thing of the past.

M. M., Chicago, Ill. To assist a discussion, kindly tell us in THE MAIL-BAG which you consider the more important, the day school teacher or the Sunday School teacher?

The teacher in day school has to lay the foundation of the secular education, storing the minds of his scholars with the facts of history, science, biography, and geography and with the principles of arithmetic and accounting. It is left exclusively to the Sunday School teacher to instil into the mind and heart of the scholar not only the foundation facts and principles of the Christian religion, but also the associated virtues of honor, truthfulness, integrity, friendship, humanity, generosity, etc. In the old Greek and Roman educational systems, the inculcation of these virtues, and those of courage, strength, patriotism, and loyalty, was a prominent feature. These have little or no equivalent in our day school, which teaches largely such practical studies as will lead to the development of the business side of character.

D. M., Orangedale, Cape Breton, Can. Did the worshipers of God previous to 800 B.C. anticipate atonement through the death of Christ? Did it form the basis or any part of their faith, or did they know anything at all about it?

The expectation of the coming Messiah, who should redeem his people and should suffer for their sakes, is as old as the beginnings of Hebrew nationality. See Isa. 53; Zech. 11: 13. The idea of propitiation, reconciliation and expiation was associated with his coming, and although substitution is not mentioned it is implied. In connection with the sacrificial offerings similar terms are sometimes used, but the broader view of vicarious sacrifice, with special reference to the Messianic atonement, is most fully set forth in Isa. 53. The Messianic mission was the salvation of the race (Isa. 11). This expectation was not wholly confined to the Jewish people. The Samaritans held it; the Magi knew of it; even in the days of Melchizedek and Job it was understood by inquiring souls (Job 19: 25). The very first recorded Scriptural allusion to it is in Gen. 49: 10. See also Isa. 9: 1-7; Isa. 40; Micah 5: 2. There were periods in Jewish history during which the Messianic predictions and expectations temporarily ceased, but they were never wholly extinguished. It should be admitted, however, that while some of the Jewish Targumistic writings refer to a suffering Messiah, the greater number deal with a powerful and conquering Messiah. Faith in God, belief in his word and a willing obedience were accounted for righteousness in the old dispensation. See Gen. 15: 8 and Rom. 4: 3-6, 20, 25 and other passages. Incidentally it may be mentioned that Job is supposed to have lived about the time of Isaac, some 1800 B.C., Daniel 600 B.C., Micah 950 B.C., Isaiah 750 B.C., Zechariah, 520 B.C.

Mrs. M. H., Hancock, N. Y. Why do not our ministers preach more against Sunday labor? I asked my former pastor, and he says the time has not yet come to do so. I ask my present pastor and he looks up and down and does not answer me.

The commandment enjoining Sabbath observance has not been abrogated. It is the duty of the Christian pulpit to preach it; but there is a great deal too much latitude in this direction nowadays. You may not have been sufficiently explicit in your question, otherwise there is no reason why your pastor should not have answered. The only work that is justifiable on the Lord's Day is that which is of necessity or mercy.

G. S. V., Franklin, Pa. What is meant in I. Cor. 12: 10 where it speaks of divers kinds of "tongues"? There are people here who claim the "gift of tongues" and they go around among church members and try to make them believe they are the only people that are right, even when they talk in a tongue they themselves do not know.

It refers not only to the power of speaking various languages, but also to a spiritual language unknown to man, uttered in ecstasy and understood only by those enlightened by the Holy Spirit. Paul is here writing not to depreciate this gift, but to warn the Corinthians not to be led away by unprofitable or doubtful manifestations of it. Even in those early days of the Church, the leaders had difficulty in controlling the tendency to fanaticism among its adherents. The gift of tongues at Pentecost was given because of a great and urgent need. It is supposed by some authorities to have been speaking so that under the direction of the Holy Spirit it sounded to the ear of every auditor as though it were his own mother-tongue. There were many nationalities represented in the throng, but no confusion or misunderstandings. It was the miraculous method employed to bring into the Gospel fold the strangers from other lands. The lesson is that God is not the author of confusion, and he never gives a message to his children that is unintelligible. Any "gift" or message that is incapable of being understood is not of God. We should try the spirits by this simple but decisive test.

P. A., Hillsboro, Tex. Who are the "sons of thunder," and where are they mentioned in the Bible?

Boanerges, which means "sons of thunder," was a surname given by Jesus to James and John, probably on account of their impetuous spirit (see Mark 3: 17; Luke 9: 45). "Boanerges" is a word which has greatly puzzled the philologists. It has been variously interpreted as "sons of commotion" and "sons of tumult" or disorder. Your other questions will be answered by mail.

E. V., Allentown, Pa. Does history anywhere give the name of Pharaoh's daughter, who found Moses in the river and adopted him?

Josephus, the Jewish historian, tells us her name was Thermutis. He adds that she carried the child to her father, the king, and told him she had adopted him to become the heir to the kingdom. Pharaoh clasped the child to his breast and playfully set his diadem upon his head, but the child threw it down and trod upon it with his feet.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. C. L., Scott, O. The subject of infant salvation was fully discussed in a recent issue.

Mrs. M. E. C., Washington, D. C. We have referred your question to a good authority on the subject.

Reader, Russell, Ont. As the battle is now a thing of the past, it is useless to discuss it. You may be sure, however, that nothing was or is further from the thought of Americans than annexation.

Interested, Walton, N. Y., writes: "There are 10,000 Covenanters, only they are called "Reformed Presbyterians." These 10,000 gave $260,000 last year, or $26 per member, for church work."

FRIED OYSTERS

One pint large oysters, half cup flour, half cup milk, half cup Snider's Tomato Catsup, half teaspoonful salt. Mix thoroughly the flour, milk, catsup and salt; dip oysters into mixture, then roll them in cracker crumbs; fry in sweet, fresh lard until a dark brown. Serve very hot.

Mrs. Clara L. Street.

For a feast let it be OYSTERS fried in the Snider Way and served with plenty of the luscious

Snider's Tomato Catsup

However distinguished the guests, however elaborate or however simple the repast, you cannot "conjure up" a more elegant, popular or delicious dish than fried oysters, done exactly according to this recipe, contributed by a hostess whose "functions" are notable and enviable for their perfection of cuisine.

All winter, enjoy the wholesome oyster at its best by serving, always, cooked or raw, with plenty of Snider's Catsup.

The one Catsup to always buy is Snider's. For over a quarter of a century it has held the reputation of "best." The women of America are good judges of food quality, and they still give it first place by their increased patronage.

Here are some of the reasons why Snider's deserves its first place: Its superior flavor is largely due to the superfine tomatoes used in its making. We furnish the vines to the farmers, who raise them for us, because we are particular to have only pedigreed tomatoes of that sweet, slightly spicy flavor which makes the perfect foundation for this ideal table relish. These selected tomatoes, grown and gathered according to our directions, are all "done into catsup" the very day they are gathered—precisely in accord with our famous old recipe in which seven rare spices, the purest obtainable, are used.

Snider's Catsup is a direct and wholesome stimulant to the appetite and to digestion. Its liberal use, in and on the daily food, especially upon all meats, hot or cold, upon fish, vegetables, spaghetti, and in soups and gravies, helps to produce and maintain robust health.

Snider's Process Pork and Beans are a feast at any feast. Snider's Chili Sauce is always liked. Use it upon meats.

Always superior because always made in the same unequalled way.

RISKS AND CERTAINTIES

MR. G. G. HENRY, in his admirable work on Investments, gives five points which he says should be carefully considered by every one before making an investment. Briefly summarized these are: First, Safety of principal and interest, which implies the certainty of receiving the principal and interest when due; second, rate of interest, or the net return that is realized on the money invested; third, convertibility into cash, or the readiness with which it is possible to realize on the investment; fourth, prospect of appreciation in value, or that growth in intrinsic value that tends to increase the market price; fifth, stability of market price, or the certainty of continuing the integrity of the original investment.

The five qualities of an investment set forth by Mr. Henry are present in varying degrees in every selection that may be made, and it is rare to find all equally combined in one form of security. The shrewd investor naturally selects those securities that possess the qualities that meet his own individual requirements. The average investor is apt to overlook the fact that a high degree of one quality is very apt to involve a lower degree of other qualities. He is pretty sure to believe that a high rate of interest implies less assurance of safety, but it is not often that he gives the same consideration to the other qualities. When wishing to make a permanent investment for the sole purpose of income and with no thought of immediate selling, he is very apt to lessen the earning power of his money by paying a higher price for and receiving a diminished return from securities whose strongest feature is their convertibility. It would be better business if such a man selected securities having equal safety and stability, but which, though having less convertibility, would bring in larger returns and at the same time have in them the promise of a rise in market price. While, as a rule, the private investor does not need to give much thought to the question of convertibility, it may be a first consideration to the man in active business, who at any moment may feel a pressing need for more ready money, and who must therefore regard interest as of secondary importance.

The prospect of appreciation in value, while worth considering, is not of first importance to the average investor, while it may be the main consideration with the rich man, who, not being dependent on immediate returns, can put his securities in the safe and quietly await their growth. But while the rich man can afford to do this, and usually to his own great advantage, it would certainly not be advisable for the poorer man to follow his example. The one can insure his own risks; under no circumstances should the other undertake them.

The Quality of Safety

By "safety" we mean the security of principal and interest. At first glance it might be thought that the safety of the one involved the safety of the other, but a more careful examination will show that there is a decided difference between the two. In some cases the principal is much safer than the interest, in others it is the reverse. Here is an illustration: A strong railroad leases a terminal, or it may be a branch line, and by the terms of the lease it guarantees the interest during the life of the lease, on the bonds of the leased property. While this lease lasts the interest is perfectly secure, but when the lease expires and the bonds mature, the railroad may see fit to abandon the property, and the only security for the bonds is the actual value, which may be wholly inadequate, of the property surrendered. Here is an illustration showing that the interest may, for a time, be suspended and the bonds be secure and worth while as an investment: In the West, and other thinly settled parts of our country, new railroads are frequently built with money secured by the sale of bonds, usually at a price far below their face value. For a time, it may be for some years, there is no interest, because there are no net earnings after the payment of up-keep and operating expenses; but the road has stimulated business, increased the settlement of lands along the line, so that in time there is a balance above the fixed charges, the interest is regularly met and the stock has a market value. In such a case the bonds from the first were a good investment, for they not only increased in value, as it was certain they would do, but the lapsed interest was met from the increased earnings.

Stability of market price should not be compared with the quality of safety. Safety means that the maker of the obligation will pay the principal and interest when they are due; stability means that the market price shall not shrink in value. An investment may be absolutely secure as to principal and interest, and yet owing to the violent changes — financial squalls they might be called—that often occur in business, it may suffer a great decline in market price.

In periods of continued business prosperity, money is in great demand and ready cash commands a high rate of interest and this because the available money has been converted into fixed forms in the development of new enterprises. Under such circumstances the prices of securities bearing lower rates of interest are sure to decline, for the reason that their owners—anxious to secure the higher current rates—force them on the market.

Now, the prudent average investor will not lose his head and sell out a secure property even though the interest for cash at the time is temptingly higher, for he will reason that this high tide can no more continue in the currents of finance than it does in the waters of the ocean. The changed investment for a higher rate may be entirely secure, but unless it has in it the quality of permanency, it should be very carefully considered before it is undertaken.

Two Kinds of Appreciation

A SPEAKER in a temperance convention declared that the work of temperance people and of the W. C. T. U. never had been or would be appreciated. He told this story: "While taking dinner with a widow, I complimented her on the delicious huckleberry pie she had made in the New England style—so very juicy—and said it was the best I had ever eaten. 'Oh, I am so glad to have that compliment,' she replied, and then went on to say: 'I was married twenty years to my first husband and did all I could to please him, but he never appreciated what I did for him. Just before he passed away, I longed for a word of approval, and asked him if I had not been a good wife, or if I had totally failed to please him. He replied: "If I had wanted things different, I'd have let you know soon enough." '

"She married again and, after about twenty years of unappreciated endeavor in housekeeping, she asked her second husband if he had no word of approval for all she had tried to do. The ungrateful man's reply was 'If I don't like what you do, you may be certain I'll inform you.'"

How different the prompt words of commendation which we hope may fall from the lips of the Master, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

ABBIE'S REBELLION

By LASCELLES HASBROUCK

IT WAS afternoon in early autumn, and a wagon with two occupants was being slowly driven along a country lane. The driver, whose expression denoted extreme beatitude, raised his whip at intervals; but so gentle was its touch that the horse only shook his ears as if acknowledging a playful attention, and continued in his favorite pace. By the man's side sat a sweet-faced woman of five and thirty, lost, like her companion, in happy silence. Perhaps if interrogated neither could have told of any feeling in regard to what lay around them; and yet they had a consciousness of harmony between nature's peace and their own. The glory of the distant hills, the rosy gleam of ripening fruit, the light and shadow chasing each other over the golden cornfields, the music of a tumbling brook —these were as a part of their daily lives, which they saw without seeing. Yet to neither had the world ever seemed so fair; for the storm and stress of life lay behind them, and in their hearts joy-bells were ringing. They had come in sight of a substantial house, when the woman laid her hand on the man's arm.

"Simon, I guess you'd better set me down right here; there's Sister Hannah's wagon down by the barn; I guess she and Marget's druv over."

There was something in her manner which conveyed the impression that the unexpected visit of her relations was not an unmixed joy; a feeling it was equally clear her companion shared.

"You'll tell 'em, Abbie?" he said hesitatingly.

"To be sure I'll tell 'em," she replied, and a flush rose to her cheek.

"Hadn't I better come right along in?"

"No, Simon, it's real good of you, but—" She paused and smiled tenderly upon him; he returned the smile.

He had by this time assisted Abbie to alight and was preparing to resume his seat.

"I know I warn't never no favorite wi' your folks; but I don't see as it matters much."

"It don't matter at all," she returned smilingly, "and it never will; I've never been nothin' beholden to 'em." And with this declaration of independence she turned off the road. Simon called out that he "would be along presently," and applying his whip to his astonished steed, was soon lost to view in a cloud of dust.

Abbie Marlin had been for many years the faithful attendant of a wealthy resident of Griffin's Corners, who at her death had most liberally remembered her services. Since her access of fortune, she had found herself an object of great interest to her relations, who appeared to occupy their spare moments in making plans for her future.

Abbie was warmly greeted by her sisters, who had been spending their time very pleasantly in making a thorough investigation of her lately acquired possessions. The conversation was general during tea, and not until the last piece of china was put away was the subject of their visit broached.

"'Pears to me," said Mrs. Watkins, "you'll feel kind of lonesome out here by yourself."

"Yes," added Mrs. Adams, "when a woman's gettin' on she misses her folks."

"Yes," said Abbie, "I've missed poor Mis' Williams."

"Jest what I said to Marget," continued Mrs. Watkins. "'Marget,' says I, 'Abbie'll be jest dreffal lonesome out there; an' there ain't no sense in her livin' by herself, when she can have a home wi' either of us.'"

"Thank you, Hannah, it's real good of you an' Marget; but I don't know as I was thinkin' of leavin' the Corners just yet."

"Oh, I ain't sayin' nothin' agin' the Corners; but Marget an' me we've visited a good deal over it; an' we say there ain't no need for you to be by yourself, when you belong to a family like ours."

"Yes," responded Mrs. Adams, "the Marlins always hung well together."

Abbie reflected, but failed to recall any evidence of the sweet adhesiveness to which her sisters referred, and from the remembrance of which they seemed to derive moral strength and satisfaction. Of a certainty she had never benefited by it; but as politeness seemed to demand acquiescence, Abbie murmured a faint assent.

"We was jest sayin' as we come along, Marget an' me, as we couldn't remember a single funeral as we'd missed."

"That's so," rejoined Mrs. Adams with the air of one firmly planted on the heights of duty nobly done; "come rain, come shine, we was there."

A faint smile curved Abbie's lips; this virtue, on the exercise of which her sisters especially prided themselves, did not appeal strongly to the gentle soul whose creed was love and service to the living.

"I was talkin' about you to the minister only yesterday," observed Mrs. Watkins, "an' he said it was quite wonderful the way the door of usefulness was opened to some women."

A tender smile flitted over Abbie's face, giving it the beauty of youth.

"I would like to believe that," she said softly; "to feel that the Lord directs one's steps."

"Oh, there's no doubt about it," returned Mrs. Watkins, with the confidence of one speaking with ministerial assurance; "nothin' could be plainer than it is in your case; there's Brother Lenny——"

"Yes, there's Lenny," repeated Abbie, without an enthusiasm in her voice.

"Yes, if ever a man needed a hefty woman round, it's Lenny."

Abbie thought of the seven irrepressible young Marlins, and of Lenny, selfish, shiftless and irritable; certainly the prospect was not alluring save to one bent on martyrdom.

"But Lenny was not anxious to have me," she replied quietly; "when father died I offered——"

"There, there!" interrupted Mrs. Watkins impatiently; "don't begin rakin' up things; there ain't nothin' to be got threshin' over old straw. It's

A Word to Housewives from the Standard Oil Company

EVERY woman knows the cleansing qualities of naphtha and benzine. It is impracticable to use either of these for washing clothes, as they are dangerous to handle around the stove.

Parowax is our trade name for pure refined paraffine,—another petroleum product, with all the cleansing properties of naphtha and benzine,—but with no odor, no taste, no possible danger.

It is so pure you may chew it like gum.

A little Parowax, shaved, and boiled with the clothes and the usual amount of shaved soap, dissolves the grease and dirt and brings the things out fresh and clean.

No hard rubbing; none of the destructive wear of the wash-board.

Parowax saves labor and saves clothes.

It can not injure the daintiest fabric.

A pound package of Parowax contains four cakes—enough for about sixteen boilers of wash.

Parowax costs but little and is sold by grocers, druggists and general dealers everywhere.

We ask you to try Parowax in this week's washing; or to have your laundress try it.

We shall be glad to send you a sample cake free if you will send us your name. Address Dept. 25, 56 New St., New York.

You Can Make Clothes Last Twice as Long

No longer are old and faded dresses relegated to the rag bag—at least not by the practical housewife. Instead, she seeks the nearby shop for those dyes which never fail to give new life and beauty to every material. She asks for, and insists upon, Diamond Dyes.

You will find that by following this example, you can easily have many such profitable experiences as the one quoted herewith:

"I have had a great deal of experience with Diamond Dyes and have been successful. Just this last week, I dipped a last summer's dress (a light blue soisette which had lost its newness and rich color by continual washing and hot sunshine) into a weak solution of the light blue dye, and it surely looks like a new dress. In this day of fashion and styles, the yoke and trimming of a gown must all blend into the same color scheme. By the use of Diamond Dyes one can very easily accomplish this at home, saving time and expense. Mrs. P. W. B., 2415 W. 42d Street, Minneapolis, Minn."

Diamond Dyes

There are two kinds of Diamonds Dyes—one for Wool or Silk, the other for Cotton, Linen or Mixed Goods. Diamond Dyes for Wool or Silk now come in Blue envelopes. And, as heretofore, those for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods are in White envelopes.

Here's the Truth About Dyes for Home Use:

Our experience of over thirty years has proven that no one dye will successfully color every fabric.

There are two classes of fabrics—animal fibre fabrics and vegetable fibre fabrics.

Wool and Silk are animal fibre fabrics. Cotton and Linen are vegetable fibre fabrics. "Union," or "Mixed", goods are 40% to 80% Cotton—so must be treated as vegetable fibre fabrics.

Vegetable fibres require one class of dye, and animal fibres another and radically different class of dye. As proof—we call attention to the fact that manufacturers of woolen goods use one class of dye, while manufacturers of cotton goods use an entirely different class of dye.

For these reasons we manufacture one class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, and another class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Wool or Silk, so that you may obtain the very best results on EVERY fabric.

REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Cotton, Linen or Mixed Goods.

AND REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Wool or Silk, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Wool or Silk.

Diamond Dyes are sold at the uniform price of 10c per package.

OUR COMFORT CORNER

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

The Outsider in the Home

THE position, for example, of a nurse who must for a time be constantly in a household and in a sense an integral part of it while she remains in many ways outside its interests, is seldom other than difficult. A trained nurse is in these days an absolute essential in periods of severe illness. Time was that the invalid was cared for by members of the family until their strength gave out, when neighbors would kindly come in, sit up at night and otherwise relieve the overburdened household. I remember to have heard a doctor of the old school at the time when the trained nurse with her serene professional air and her dainty uniform was as yet a novelty, say positively, "I wish none of these new fangled young women to assist in my practice. Any intelligent woman who can administer medicine and obey a doctor's orders can do the nursing that I want." Had the good man lived a few years longer he would have changed his opinion. For many reasons a nurse can take better care of a patient who is extremely ill than can be taken by wife, sister or mother. The element of anxiety only partially enters into the attitude of the nurse. She is intensely desirous for the recovery of her patient. She is not torn into shreds by the agony of her love, nor wasted by hours of weeping and torturing fears as the patient's nearest and dearest of kin may be. She is able with a steady hand and a keen eye to watch every vagary and fluctuation of disease. The physician turns to her as his best ally, and neither home nor hospital can afford to do without her.

In the home, however, the family frequently resent what seems to them the officious and intrusive manner of the nurse. She behaves as one having authority. She is not always endowed with tact, that saving grace of womanhood. Not invariably does she conciliate those whom she keeps out of the invalid's room. In the kitchen the cook resents her presence and sometimes makes it a trifle unpleasant for her when she invades that sacred domain of pots and pans that she may prepare the meals of a convalescent.

Whoever is in a home for a length of time should be of it in the truest meaning of the term. She should become a friend of the family and be treated with friendliness. There are times when she should efface herself and leave the family to enjoy its own society. This, as well, is true of a guest who is staying beneath a friendly roof. It is true of the young teacher boarding away from home and domiciled among strangers. As for the home people, they do less than their duty if they are not kind and thoughtful in their treatment of any one who is tarrying with them and is still an outsider. In fact, all along the line tact, sympathy and common sense eliminate friction and make home life worth living.

We must many times abide for a season by a fireside not our own, but we need not be aliens or keep the heart of the stranger or the mien of the hermit. We may meet others half way and be genial and cordial in all circumstances.

The Household Linen

THE question has frequently been asked whether the bride's outfit of linen for the new home shall be marked with her maiden initials or with those of her married name. As the bride is supposed to provide the entire stock of linen, inclusive of sheets, pillow slips, table-cloths, napkins, towels of all descriptions and whatever belongs to the comfortable completeness of household linen, it should be marked with her own maiden initials. These may be beautifully embroidered if she and her friends have time enough at their disposal for this delicate needlework. How much linen should be made ready depends on the circumstances of the bride-to-be and also on the style in which she expects to live. In Holland, France and Germany the thrifty mother begins to fill the wedding chest of her daughter while the latter is in the cradle. Little by little the chest is filled and there is no straining of effort in that department when the maiden is wooed and won. The woman who does not care about linen has missed something that is sweet and feminine. The very handling of it is a delight to the ordinary woman.

In giving a linen shower to a bride everything useful and ornamental for the individual as well as for the household use may properly be on the list. The shower may be of handkerchiefs, guest towels, center-pieces, doilies, serviettes and whatever else is dear to a woman's heart in the days when she is preparing a trousseau and looking forward to home-making.

In giving a shower the hostess may provide herself with a large hamper or basket and this, if she choose, she may decorate with gay ribbons and bunches of flowers. When inviting the friends of the recipient to unite in a shower for her benefit the hostess may suggest that each shall write a sentiment, a limerick or a wish and fasten it to her gift. The gift should be wrapped in tissue paper and tied with very narrow ribbon. When all are present and preferably after the serving of refreshments the gifts are to be taken out one by one and bestowed upon the guest of honor. As she opens her various parcels a friend beside her may read the sentiments that have accompanied the articles which are to be her wedding gifts.

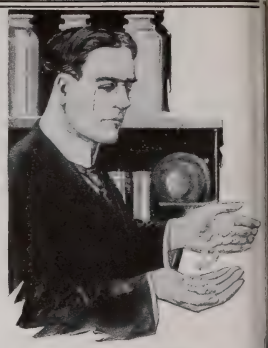
No matter how exquisite linen may be, it will not long preserve its daintiness if carelessly laundered. An incompetent washerwoman will scorch the fine towels that have been the pride of their owner, will use too much blueing and turn them from the tub streaked and gray, or in some other way will ruin their freshness and purity. The care of linen and its nice arrangement in the linen closet belong to good housekeeping and the bride of this October ought to be a good housekeeper as well as a loving home-maker.



In the purchase of linen the novice may be deceived by simple costliness. There are times and seasons when wonderful bargains are displayed in the shops, but the experienced buyer is neither dazzled by a bargain nor is she tempted to extravagance by the large price set upon the tablecloths and napkins offered for inspection by the salesman. She knows what she wants, can tell by a touch or a glance the fabric that will wear and be a credit to its owner for years.

How a College Professor

Made Delicious Morsels by Exploding Wheat and Rice

Prof. A. P. Anderson, formerly of Columbia University, thus solved the problem of exploding grain. And he gave to you all Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice—the most enticing cereal foods you know.

In each kernel of grain lies a percentage of moisture, which heat will turn to steam. If the steam is confined, and the heat is sufficient, an explosive force is created.

The moisture permeates every food granule. To explode it means blasting those granules to pieces. And that means to make the cereals twice as digestible as by any other process known.

Shot From Mammoth Guns

Prof. Anderson did this by building bronze-steel guns. The grains are put into them, then sealed up steam-tight.

The gun is revolved for sixty minutes in a furnace heat—a heat of 550 degrees. Thus the grain is cooked to a plastic mass, and the moisture turned to steam.

When the gun is unsealed that steam explodes. There is a separate explosion inside of each grain—inside of each granule of grain. The millions of food particles are blasted to pieces. The grains are puffed to eight times normal size—made four times as porous as bread.

The plastic walls are expanded and crisped. A myriad cells are created. Yet the coats of the grain are unbroken. That's how you get these curious foods which everyone delights in.

How Folks Like Them Best

In the morning one serves them with sugar and cream, or mixes them with fruit. And the taste is like toasted nuts.

For luncheons or suppers they are served in milk. They are like fairy wafers, crisp and porous. And they are whole-grain foods.

They are used like nuts in candy making and as garnish for ice cream. They are eaten dry, like peanuts, sprinkled with a little salt.

There is no other food made from wheat or rice so delightful as these puffed grains. Your grocer is always supplied.

Why We ake These Extreme Watch Tests

A South Bend Watch, frozen in ice or immersed in boiling water, will keep perfect time. And every South Bend Watch is given equally extreme temperature tests before it leaves the actory. For, in satisfying ourselves that our watches will stand such severe rials for accuracy, we know that they will be accurate under ordinary conditions in the ordinary wearer's pocket.

"The South Bend Watch"

The Master Timepiece

Every South Bend Watch gets 411 inspections in the making and then passes through a Special Inspection Department for its final O. K. It must run 700 hours without variation before it goes out. It is thus that we built the reputation of South Bend Watches and thus that we must maintain it.

We maintain it also by restricting the sale so only expert jewelers handle them. For expert jewelers only know how to regulate good watches to the personality of the wearer.

That "personal adjustment" to your personality is absolutely necessary because good watches run differently for different people. If you walk much, ride a great deal in motor cars, move quickly, etc., your watch is affected and should be regulated to offset the general condition under which you carry a watch.

Only a good jeweler can do this, and it can be done only with a good watch, for common watches are not sensitive enough for such delicate regulation—hence, seldom keep time for anybody.

Write us for the free book, "How Good Watches Are Made." It tells all about watches and will help you get the right watch for your needs. You can get a South Bend Watch in a solid gold case for $75, or in gold-filled and other metal cases at reasonably low prices.

manifold interests of the great world. It happened the other day in New York that two aged employees of the postoffice department were dismissed after a half century of service. They had begun their work when they were young and strong, when the city was small and quiet, when homes were scattered, when everything was as different as possible from the rushing, hurrying New York of to-day. There was no pension for these faithful servants of the Government, worn out in the labors of the postal department. They were simply cast aside as derelicts, and the general feeling concerning them must be that if there are pensions for veteran firemen and policemen, some provision should be made for men who have grown gray and become blind and deaf and old and feeble in delivering mail from door to door.

All sorts of letters go safely across the ocean, over mountain chains, over rivers, valleys and continents, their safety insured by a bit of paper called a postage stamp. There are letters of congratulation, of invitation, of business and condolence. Every letter worth opening and reading requires an answer, and the person who neglects to answer a letter is guilty of an incivility. Not to answer a letter because one does not like its contents or is indifferent to the writer or the letter is inopportune, is to be decidedly discourteous. Postal cards are convenient, but they lack the reserve that should distinguish a letter. To notify members of a committee of the day of meeting, to carry a business order or to relate briefly a bit of home news nothing is better than a postal card. It is much to be feared that the beautiful picture postals everywhere on sale have interfered very much with the long chatty and descriptive letters which were once matters of course in friendly correspondence.

The fact is that the sending a picture postal instead of a letter is often an indication either of physical fatigue or mental inertia. By all means send the picture postals. They will be charming souvenirs of journeys in days to come when memory loves to recall agreeable outings. Send the letters, too. To the home people these voices from the absent are welcome and there is disappointment when they are omitted.

different now; an' there's a home an' your work all cut out for you."

"The minister thought it was just beautiful." And Mrs. Adams closed her eyes as if lost in blissful contemplation of Abbie's happy future.

"It was real kind of him," answered Abbie, "but I don't know as I'm hankerin' after so much work." Even while she spoke Abbie wondered at her own temerity in daring to question the authority of her family, buttressed as it was by the wisdom of the minister.

"But when it's your duty, Abbie," and Mrs. Watkins' thin lips closed in a manner more expressive than words.

"Yes, when a woman hasn't a husband, she ought to listen to what her folks says," added Mrs. Adams, with that patronizing air peculiar to many matrons when addressing spinsterhood.

"I guess I'm just about tired of hearin' about my duty; who among you ever counted me any thanks for what I've done? Only old Mis' Williams." But here the tender soul's voice choked as she thought of the woman who had so unexpectdly rewarded her patient care.

"Abbie, I'm jest right down shocked at you!" And Mrs. Watkins moved her chair a little farther away, to emphasize her displeasure.

"I don't care," Abbie went on with the recklessness born of the first taste of liberty; "seems to me the world is gettin' pretty well crowded wi' folks goin' round showin' other folks their duties; I guess they find it a long sight easier pointin' to a load than heftin' it."

The sisters sat in seething indignation as Abbie asserted her inalienable right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness; their worst fears were realized; the situation was serious.

"Abbie Marlin," and Mrs. Watkins' voice was appalling in its slow distinctness, "we know what this means; and we're going to stop it."

A wave of color swept over Abbie's face, but a smile came back to her lips.

"We've heard; it's Simon Johnson, he's after your money; can't you see?"

"No, I can't," replied Abbie quietly. "Simon always wanted me, yes, fifteen years ago; but none of you would take care of father; an' Simon had his mother then, an' so I told him no; you needn't shake your head, Marget; he asked me often enough."

"He married all the same," remarked Mrs. Adams, whose opinion of masculine fidelity was not of an exalted or romantic character.

"And why shouldn't he? His mother needed care, an' he got a good wife an' he made her happy; an' I am glad he did," replied Abbie, with a little catch in her voice she strove hard to subdue. Not to these hard, scheming women could she speak of what the agony of parting with her love had been; nor of the dreariness of the loveless years which followed.

"Oh, very glad, no doubt," returned Mrs. Adams with an elephantine attempt at sarcasm. "We understand how much there was to that; and now he is after your money."

Abbie turned sharply on her tormentors, a crimson spot burning in each cheek and a passionate light flashing in her eyes. She was defending the man she loved, the man who had always loved her, from a false accusation; and it was another Abbie, utterly unlike the sister they had always known, who confronted them. She had a little secret, by the disclosure of which she meant finally to rout the enemy, horse, foot and artillery; but that was reserved for the last charge.

"My money! An' how much did any of you think of me till I got it? Did any of you offer me a home till now, when I don't need it? Do any of you, does Lenny, want me now, 'cept for it, an' the work I'd do?"

"Hear you now!" said Mrs. Watkins to her discomfited companion in arms.

"And after our havin' come over and offered to stand by her, as it were," responded Mrs. Adams, with the air of one who has made a great personal sacrifice and been cruelly misunderstood.

"It 'ud be jest a dretful pity to let that money go out o' the family," sighed Mrs. Watkins with genuine feeling.

"An' when a woman is gettin' on, an' ain't married, I don't see what she wants so much as——" began Mrs. Adams.

"Lovin' kindness; an' that's what she's never had much on as yet," broke in a voice from the doorway.

"An' pray, Simon Johnson," said Mrs. Adams, rising with the slow majesty of heavy women, "what right have you to put in your oar?"

"The best in the world," said Abbie, going to him; "we were married this morning."

Gives children proper nourishment.

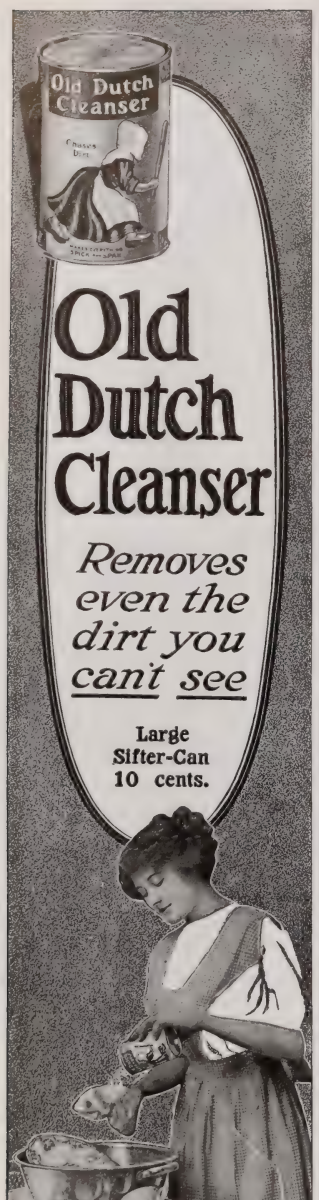
In these days of new "fad" foods it is very easy to fill a child's stomach without giving him enough to eat.

A plump round little body should be natural with every child—if your children are otherwise, they need more nourishment! Grown-ups require only enough food to maintain their strength and energy—a child needs that; and then a great deal more to grow up on.

RALSTON WHEAT FOOD

is just the sort of solid, substantial old-fashioned food that growing children should have. It is the finest hard wheat, ground, with all the nutriment left in. It has the natural color and wholesome flavor of pure whole wheat.

Ralston is a wonderful body-building, muscle-making food that is bound to benefit any child. And my, how good it tastes—you won't have to urge your children to eat this nourishing food.



Ralston is not factory cooked—it is fresh cooked, every morning, in your own kitchen—and brought to your table fresh, tempting and delicious. Serve with cream and sugar.

Get a package of Ralston today, for your children's sake—you will like it as much as they will.

ALTARS FOR WORSHIP*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

"AND when the seventh month was come . . . they set the altar upon its bases" (verses 1 and 3). It was the seventh month from the time they left Babylon, from March to September. They had probably been four months on the way, for that was the time it took Ezra to make the same journey (Ezra 7: 9.) They had spent three months in preparing necessary habitations for themselves, where for fifty years all had lain in desolation. Then they proceeded to set up an altar as the forerunner of the temple which they had come to rebuild. They chose the most sacred spot on the sacred mount, often called "the dome of the rock." It was the selfsame spot where the altar of burnt-offerings had stood in the temple of Solomon, and where, before that, Abraham had raised an altar on which to offer his son Isaac. Recent excavations have aroused fresh interest in the location.

"They offered burnt offerings thereon unto the Lord . . . morning and evening" (v. 3), which was according to the law given to them through Moses (Num. 28: 3). Thus not only was the temple begun in the building of the altar, but the worship of God was restored. It has been said, "The altar was to Judaism what the cross is to Christianity."

The Hebrew's Thanksgiving

"They kept also the Feast of Tabernacles" (v. 4). This was a feast which lasted eight days, and was a sort of "harvest home" in its inception. The "fruits" which the Hebrews had to offer to God on this occasion were gold, silver and other materials, which had been given them before leaving Babylon for the express purpose of rebuilding the house of God (Ezra 1: 4.) It has been estimated that $300,000 in gold and $100,000 in silver were given to them at that time (Ezra 2: 69, and Neh. 7: 71, 72). By means of these free-will offerings plans were made for securing materials and laborers for the erection of the temple (v. 7).

Now in the second year of their coming . . . began Zerubbabel to set forward the work of the house of the Lord." It was an occasion of great pomp; the priests were arrayed in their golden clothes, with purple and scarlet, and others in fine white linen, with white turbans and golden bands bearing the inscription "Holiness to the Lord." They blew trumpets as a signal for the people to come together. There were bands of singers, and bands of musicians praising and giving thanks unto the Lord. Zerubbabel was in charge, because King Cyrus had delivered to him the sacred vessels of gold and silver taken by Nebuchadnezzar, which he was restoring to the temple. And the building received the name of the builder, and is called the temple of Zerubbabel.

God's Promise for the Temple

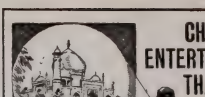
"The people could not discern the noise of the shout of joy from the noise of the weeping." Who were weeping? The old people who had seen the golden temple of Solomon. The new temple was to be one-third larger than Solomon's, but it was to be without the ark of the covenant, without the sacred fire on the altar, without the Urim and the Thummin. Lacking these things, as well as the old and glorious associations connected with the former temple, the old people wept; wept so loudly that the shouts of joy made by the younger people were drowned. But God sent a prophet to comfort the old people, and to turn their mourning into joy, even Haggai, who proclaimed a message from God: "I will fill this house with glory. . . . The glory of this latter house shall be greater than the former, and in this place will I give peace, saith the Lord of hosts." For to that temple Christ should come. The so-called temple of Herod was but the temple of Zerubbabel repaired. In connection with the story of this lesson the whole message as it is in the book of Haggai should be read.

"Weakened the hands of the people of Judah." By the refusal of Zerubbabel to allow them to participate in the rebuilding, the Samaritans were angered, and in every possible way they sought to hinder the building of the temple. They appealed against them to King Cyrus, who died about five years after the building of the temple was commenced. After this they appealed to Ahasuerus and Darius, kings who came after Cyrus, and thus the work was hindered so that the temple was about twenty years in building.

Practical Teaching of the Lesson

The Altar in Your Heart. When did you set it there? If you have not done it, why not? Do you not know that God has made us for himself, and we shall be restless until we come to him? It is of no use to try to live without God in the world, for we shall either be happy in his love, or unhappy in his sore displeasure. It has been said, "You may as soon try to fill a bag with wisdom, a chest with virtue, or a circle with a triangle, as the heart of a man with anything here below. A man may have enough of the world to sink him, but he can never have enough to satisfy him."

Those who returned from Babylon "set the altar upon his bases." What are the bases of the altar in the heart?



A full surrender of the will to God. The removal of a burden of sin gradually or suddenly. A new love to Christians and to Jesus. A new relish for the word of God. Pleasure in secret prayer, at least at times. Sin or sinful thoughts cause pain. Desires and efforts for the salvation of others. A desire to obey Christ in his commands and ordinances. Deep humility and self-abasement. A growing desire to be holy and like Christ. (This is the way Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler put it.)

Let us not forget that when those who had returned from Babylon set up the altar they continued to offer daily sacrifices upon it, both morning and evening. So it should be with the altar in the heart. We should never omit to bow before our God in prayer when we arise in the morning, and before we lie down to sleep at night. It is not enough to have religious thoughts, but we must come face to face with God, heart to heart with him, for if the act of worship is omitted, the altar in the heart will soon crumble and disappear.

A boy left home to attend the Rugby school in England. On reaching there, he found that he should occupy the same sleeping room with another boy. He thought if he knelt down by his bedside to pray, as he had done at home, he should perhaps be laughed at, and might become the laughing-stock of the school. Perhaps he would be nicknamed "Saint" or "Square-toes." Could he not get into the bed and then pray mentally? No, for that would be hiding his religion; that would be to be ashamed of Christ. So after a brief struggle in his mind, he determined to be firm and not to be ashamed of his Master and Lord. When the two retired to their room, he kneeled down and breathed in whispers his evening sacrifice of prayer and praise to his heavenly Father.

is companion looked on with astonishment, but he did not laugh. He said within himself, "Now, this is the real thing. I have seen some shams, but this is true devotion." How different it would have been if the boy had been noisy about his religion? He would only have been laughed at, but there was so much modesty and sincerity that it made a lasting impression upon the mind of his companion.

Let us remember that for nearly twenty years "the altar" was the only church the returned captives had. What if they had postponed establishing the worship of God until the building of the temple was completed? They certainly would have been in danger of losing their religion long before that time. There are many who from sickness, or some other reason, cannot attend the church service, and we believe that many of these are finding how sweet it is to have an altar in their own hearts.

The Altar in the Home. Does every CHRISTIAN HERALD home have an altar from which the praise of God daily ascends? We hardly believe this is the case. There is a sad contrast to this in the statement of a gentleman who had made a wide investigation of this matter. He says he is compelled to state that not ten per cent. of the Christian homes in our land have family prayers. Let the altar in the home be set firmly on its bases, which bases are: Daily Scripture reading. Daily family prayer. Grace at meals. Religious conversation.

There is no place where the family is so sure to come together as at the table. In ancient times there was the "peace offering" among the Jews. The one who offered it consumed a part himself, while the other part was offered to God. It typified friendship with God. May every meal in our homes be a peace offering always dedicated either in audible tones, in silence, or with bowed heads.

The Altar in the Church. That glorious pageant when the foundations of the temple were laid, ushered in by the blowing of trumpets and the strains of music from instruments and voices, did not cease even when the returned captives were hindered in the building by their enemies. The Holy Mountain was there, and upon it they assembled, or they stood in the doors of their homes, and so engaged in the public worship until the temple was completed and dedicated by being filled with the glory of God.

Let us not neglect the assembling of ourselves together, but rather let us consider that our attendance at church is a duty that cannot lightly be set aside—certainly not by any rain or other circumstance that would not prevent the using of a ticket to any sort of entertainment. Let us be honest with ourselves in this matter, both for our own sakes and for the sake of the church.

Some of us may be living in isolated places. If so, we can hold the hours of services sacred to the church by refraining from work, engaging in prayer, and possibly reading some printed sermon; and thus we can be in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and be at one with those who are assembled in the church. Let us not too readily yield to the idea that it is not possible for us to get to church.

Among the Workers

—MISS C. L. DIKEMAN, who has been a frequent contributor to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD charities, has sent a timely gift of $25 for the work of the Bowery Mission.

—REV. HOWARD H. RUSSELL, the general secretary of the Lincoln Legion, reports the enrolment of the signers of Lincoln's pledge to be 920,000. It is expected the million mark will be reached and passed on November 12.

—THE NEW TERM of the Moody Bible Institute began September 5 and at present more than four hundred and twenty-five students are in atendance—the largest in the history of the Institute. The geographical distribution includes all parts of the United States and many foreign countries as far distant as Korea, Australia and South Africa. All the leading denominations are represented.

—DR. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, who has for twelve years spoken at Chautauqua, and who, this season, led most successful and helpful devotional hours, took for his text at his last service, "He first findeth his own brother." In these days when there is such an urgent call for personal work, the noted evangelist's words were timely. Dr. Chapman said, "Our ministers are saying everywhere, "How can we recover the ground that is lost?" At the close of his talk there were to be seen groups of men gathered in all parts of the grounds talking over what they had heard. Many young men and women spoke one to another as to what they ought to do in their homes, in the Sunday Schools, in Young People's Societies, and in their churches. The address was considered one of the most helpful given during the entire season. M. A. M.

A HIGH TRIBUTE

—ONE OF THE FINEST tributes that could be paid by human lips was that which was pronounced upon an aged Christian lady, Mrs. Amelia S. Fowler, who died at New Rochelle, N. Y., lately. She was called by all who knew her the "Good Angel" of the place where she had lived nearly all her life. This beautiful title she won by helping her poorer neighbors in sickness and trouble, sometimes attending to their entire household duties. She was born in Germany eighty-two years ago.

Big Ben

They who rise to be big men
Rise early every morn—Big Ben

AMERICA has had two Big Bens.—Big Ben the first said "Early to bed and early to rise, makes a man healthy, wealthy and wise"

Big Ben the second is helping us keep this injunction. He is relied on by men who follow Franklin's advice to plow deep while sluggards sleep.

"Better late than never say men, better never late" says Big Ben.

Big Ben is a long lived and punctual sleepmeter for early risers.

He is mounted in a heavy, massive, triple plated case. His keys are big, handy, easy to wind. His face frank, open, easy to read. He is strong, sizable, handsome.—If he's oiled every other year there's no telling how long he will last.

A community of clockmakers stands back of him—Westclox, La Salle, Illinois. If you cannot find him at your jeweler, a money order addressed to them will bring him to you express charges prepaid.

Lessons From Things*

ONE object lesson is worth many academic discourses. The man who can adduce the fit parable or the apt figure to illustrate and press home a point, is armed with the most effective kind of weapon.

Probably no preacher of modern times was more successful in this direction than was the late D. L. Moody. In speaking of the familiar passage, "My peace I leave with you," he said, "Did you ever think that when Christ was dying, he made a will? Perhaps you have thought that no one ever remembered you in a will, but if you are in the Kingdom, Christ remembered you in his. He willed his body to Joseph of Arimathea, his mother to John the son of Zebedee, and he willed his Spirit back to his Father. But to his disciples he left his peace (not ours, but his) and his joy. They say a man can't make a will now that lawyers can't break, and drive a four-in-hand right through it, but I challenge them to break Christ's will. No judge or jury can set that aside."

Again, in speaking of the heart being where the treasure is, he said, "In fifteen minutes' conversation with most men you can tell whether their treasures are on earth or in heaven. Talk to a patriot about his country and you will see his eye light up; you will find his heart there. Talk to business men and tell them where they can make $1,000, and see their interest; their hearts are there. Talk of fashion to those who are living just for its affairs, and you will see their eyes kindle. Talk to a politician about politics and you will see how suddenly he becomes interested. And talk to a child of God, who is really laying up treasures in heaven, about heaven and heavenly things and he responds at once."

The wonderful allegory of the Pilgrim's Progress shows, perhaps, the most striking use that has ever been made of the object-lesson in literature. To many a mind, early taught in this book, the life of the Christian of to-day will ever seem like the pilgrimage so vividly pictured by the inspired tinker-preacher. Our trouble is a Slough of Despond; the dangers we feared but which did not hurt us, will be the chained lions; death will be the deep river to be crossed; and heaven shines to many eyes in turrets of gold and silver, as it shone to Christian and Hopeful.

The poet Traherne compares the prayer and Scripture study of the soul to a sponge drinking in water, to be presently "express" to a thirsty world; he tells us that thus also we acquire, as it were, the land on which we raise corn and make the money to pay our rent; the luscious grapes but make him think of heavenly fruit; and the lilies are only suggestions of heavenly flowers.

When William Blake sees a ball of string unwinding, he preaches of "a golden string" which if "wound into a ball, will lead you in at heaven's gate,

Built in Jerusalem's wall.

When he sees a lamb, he thinks only of the Lamb of God, "so meek and mild." The "tyger" burning bright

In the forests of the night, but suggests the wondrous skill of its Maker, and his unbounded variety of creation. His hatred of his foe grew into "a poison tree," which bore "an apple bright," and, eating it, the foe was killed.

The promontory against which the waves break suggests to the thoughtful mind the stanch soul resisting the attacks of Satan. The life on the mountain top suggests a nearness to God. The man of bright character, as Epictetus says, is like a beacon light to wandering souls; and every running brook is "a book" for him who can read it.

The Humane Society to Meet

THE American Humane Association holds its thirty-fifth annual convention at San Francisco during October. Its creed is that the practice of kindness and humanity develops nobility of character, justice and righteouoness. Two great divisions mark the work of the Association—the protection of children and animals. Of the 415 local and State societies, the majority are pushing endeavors along both lines of work.

Dr. William O. Stillman
President American Humane Association

Through the efforts of the association, humane education has been introduced into all the public schools of Porto Rico, and an encouraging beginning has been made in the Philippines and Hawaii. Fourteen States now have compulsory humane education laws and one great city, Chicago, includes the subject in its regular curriculum. The plan is to introduce humane education into every State, especially with a view to the prevention and cure of crime in children.

Bands of Mercy and work-horse parades have been successful features of the work during the past year. The year's reports show that 171,799 children and 1,347,185 animals have been cared for by the Anti-cruelty Societies in the United States. Much missionary work has been done in forming new societies in out-of-the-way sections, more new societies having been organized than during any previous year.

Bishop W. C. Doane
Vice President American Humane Association

A novel innovation during the year is the "electric water-wagon," designed by the Women's Pennsylvania Society, which has been operated in congested districts where traffic prevents the establishment of the ordinary watering station. On each wagon a large sign reads "Stop! water your horse free."

Philadelphia, Pa. J. A. S.

The Lutheran Forward Movement

THIS is a banner year in the history of the Lutheran Church in the United States, marking a great forward evangelical movement throughout that body. Lutherans everywhere are celebrating the bi-centennial of Muehlenberg, and making that event the beginning of a new era of spiritual activity and usefulness.

Dr. Henry Melchior Muehlenberg is honored as the founder of the ministerium of Pennsylvania, which is the mother of all the sixty-six Lutheran Synods in this country to-day. He was a towering figure in colonial times—remarkable as an organizer, leader, diplomat, patriot and preacher.

At the annual session of the General Lutheran Council in the historic Trinity Church, Lancaster, Pa., in September, 1911, the great work and mission of Muehlenberg were commemorated by the appointment of a Jubilee Committee, to whom has been awarded the task of raising $2,000,000 for missions in honor of the Muehlenberg Jubilee. The National Laymen's Conference endorsed this movement. The event was also marked by the formation of the new National Federation of Women's Missionary Societies of the General Council, in which Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota and the provinces of Ontario and Quebec were represented. Plans were made for the extension of mission work in India, Japan and Porto Rico, and for raising a special fund to send out an adequate home mission force into the United States and Canada. Among the active endeavors of the church that were reviewed, was the work at Ellis Island, New York, where an immigrant house is maintained which in its thirty-eight years has given protection and assistance to 368,724 Germans, of whom 69,231 were full beneficiaries. It has cared for 9,000 of the 40,000 Germans who came to this country during the past two years. Plans were also made for the raising of an additional fund of $2,000,000 in celebration of the quadri-centennial of Luther's Reformation, which occurs six years hence. The Board of Foreign Missions of the General Synod plans the extension of work in India and Africa through the Laymen's Missionary Movement. Work in India is marked by an increase in the numbers and in the efficiency of the native Christian workers, especially in the Guntur Synod. In Africa an effort is to be directed toward establishing mission stations in the interior.

There are 27 Lutheran synodical missionary societies in North America, and 66 in Europe and elsewhere—a total of 93 in the world, maintaining about 2,000 missionaries, schools, etc., at an annual outlay of over $4,000,000. The General Council, organized in Galesburg, Ill., in 1867, has two million communicants and about half a million active members in thirteen synods. The General Synod, composed of twenty-three synods, with about 300,000 active members; the Synodical Conference of four synods, with 766,000 members; the United Synod, South, of eight synods, with 48,000 members; and the Independent Synods, fifteen in number, with 650,000 active members, are other great divisions of the Lutheran Church in North America. All these great bodies are planning to celebrate in 1917, by monumental gifts to missions and to benevolence, the four hundredth anniversary of Luther's Reformation. J. A. S.

LET US HAVE PEACE

A PRAYER

LORD God of Love, let us have peace,
From war's vain sacrifice give us release,
Grant peace the victories of war cannot know,
God of the Ages, Thy mercy show.

Hast Thou not seen Thy fields and meadows green
Red with the blood of men, where war hath been?
Dost Thou not know war's fearful endless roll,
The countless graves of those who paid the toll?

Teach us to learn to build, O gentle Lord,
Not to destroy; but bend each wielded sword
Into a ploughshare, Thy fields to increase.
Lord of the lives to be, let us have peace!

God of the fatherless, we pray to Thee,
Father of all of us, hear Thou our plea.
"Peace and good-will," Thine own word increase,
Lord God of Love, let us have peace!

This Big Free Book Beats 20 Big Stores

20 Stores in 20 cities could never show you the variety of stoves to be found in the Kalamazoo Stove Book—Sent Free

"Kalamazoo Direct to You"—that's the selling slogan that has placed 170,000 stoves and ranges in cities and towns and in farm homes all over the country. We have more customers than any stove company in the world, and everyone praises our stoves and our plan.

Now—what does this direct selling mean? Simply this—cutting out the middleman, the jobber, the salesman—the dealer—every one of them—and cutting out their profits and turning these profits over to you. You'll save anywhere from $5 to $40—we have letters from customers that prove this saving. You can get our prices and see for yourself.

Don't think that Kalamazoo Stoves are expensive because they are the best. Prices run from $6.50 and $7.00 up, east of the Mississippi. Price saving is only the beginning of what the Kalamazoo will save through decreased fuel consumption. Nobody stands between us. We deal directly with you and sell you a stove just as if you lived in Kalamazoo and came over to the factory and picked your stove or range from the hundreds we have in stock. Our immense catalog enables you to choose just as if you were here. Fine, large, clean cut illustrations that show you the stoves just as they'll look in your home.

Then when you've gotton your stove—salted down the $5 to $40 saving—then we still stand back of the Kalamazoo—back it with a $100,000 guarantee. We give you any repairs you might possibly need at cost or below cost—for we know that accidents will happen now and then and we'll protect you even if the break is no fault of the stove's and, ship the repairs promptly.

When we're willing to give you such a fair and square deal, why not send for a Kalamazoo stove or range? Read below how we let you make your own trial and test of the stove in actual use in your home before you make your final decision.

Kalamazoo Queen Range

Save $5 to $40

for 30 days at our expense—we pay the freight—after that 360 days approval test—Cash or Credit. Take your Choice.

If you need a stove or range in your home you can get the best made—the Kalamazoo—at lower cost with less trouble than any ordinary stove. We guarantee to ship your stove the day the order is received. We give you the choice of hundreds of stoves of every imaginable size and style for all kinds of fuel—a choice that the biggest city dealer could n't give you—not 1-3 as many. As explained in the free book, we'll give you generous credit terms—as liberal as any dealer could extend.

You could well afford to take our word for the Kalamazoo because we have a reputation everywhere for the high quality stoves we turn out and the square way we treat our customers, but we don't ask that. We simple say—"Let us send you a Kalamazoo stove or range, paying the freight. Try it for 30 days. Use it to heat your house or to do the cooking—cook 90 meals or more—and if you're not convinced at the end of 30 days that it's the one and only stove for you—ship it right back and we'll pay the return freight." Remember we pay all freight charges whether you keep the stove or not.

More than that we give you a further test of 360 days. You have every chance to prove your Kalamazoo. No method could be more open—no method could appeal more to intelligent buyers.

You would n't get such an offer if the Kalamazoo was any but the best. It takes a faultlessly good stove—the very top notcher among the best stoves in the country—to stand such a trial and test and sell itself.

You've probably heard about Kalamazoo inspections—every single part examined at every stage of construction and every faulty piece thrown in the scrap heap. If the inspectors found a single flaw in the last inspection, back goes the stove and it keeps going back until it meets our high standards. That's why Kalamazoos "make good." That's why you'll get more comfort and satisfaction and saving in fuel bills out of your Kalamazoo than any other stove made.

Don't wait in getting the big Stove Book. Find out about the Kalamazoo. It's a wonderful proposition and a wonderful stove. It has simply swept the country—no other stove proposition like it.

Preparing for a Future of Usefulness

A SQUARE DEAL FOR BAD BOYS

By HARVEY MIDDLETON

YOU may have heard the story of the painter's model. An Italian artist met one day a child of exquisite beauty, and wishing to preserve its features, for fear he should never see such loveliness again, inted the charming face upon canvas and hung it upon the walls of his studio. his most sombre hours that sweet countenance was like an angel of light to m. Its presence filled his soul with the purest aspirations. "If ever I find," said, "a perfect contrast to this beautiful face, I will paint that also, and ng them side by side as ideals of heaven and hell.

A number of years later, he saw, in a prison he visited in a foreign country, e most hideous object he ever gazed upon—a fierce, haggard fiend, with glarg eyes and cheeks deeply furrowed with lust and crime. The artist remembred his vow, and immediately painted a picture of this loathsome character, to ng beside the lovely boy. The contrast was perfect. His dream was realized. agine, then, his amazement when, on inquiring into the history this repulsive wretch, he found that he was once the lovely y! The demon had once been an angel.

That story, which is a perfectly true one, is a striking reminder the fact that, as surely as the blush of health fades before star- tion and disease, so does moral loveliness fade in the presence vice and degradation. We shall probably never know what il influences turned the lovely boy into the hardened and fierce emy of society; but we do know that ninety per cent. of the ses that come into the Children's Courts, now flourishing in merican cities, hail from e slum and sweat-shop disicts, where there is the reatest congestion of popation. That there is a emendous and increasing ndency to juvenile crimality no one connected with ie administration of justice any great American city enies, but it is a sociological, not a criminal, question, nd the Children's Courts nd their probation officers ave saved countless would- murderers, boy bandits, ickpockets, burglars and rebugs from a life of crime nd sent them on the road of prightness of character.

It has been recognized for me time, however, that he work of the Children's ourt would be only tranent unless another and ore important step was aken in the establishment f a school for wayward and eglected children that ould be as great an imrovement on the brutalizg reformatory of former times as the Children's Court is to the former method of treating juvenile offenders—in other words, a real parental school. To the general reader the conception of the State as a parent is associated with ideas of the most repellent kind. It calls up visions of dreary barrack-like institutions wherein children are cared for in batches by grim State officials. It suggests the substitution of official discipline for maternal affection, and appears to involve the complete destruction of parental responsibility.

But the desire of Father Knickerbocker was to give these little offenders of the Children's Court something that they could not get in the evil surroundings of their home life, and that was "a square deal." The first step in this direction was the purchase of a magnificent estate of 150 acres of rolling land in the beautiful open country, half way between Flushing and Jamaica, on Long Island. Here was erected a group of handsome, clean-cut buildings, in the Spanish style, consisting at present of an administration building and three comfortable white stone cottages, each designed to house two separate families of thirty-six boys under the care of a married couple. The old-fashioned truant machinery, with its whitewashed walls, husky attendants, and striped uniforms, is conspicuous by its absence, the whole atmosphere pervading the institution being that of a very comfortable boarding school amid delightful surroundings.

Mr. Hobart H. Todd

In the cottages, in addition to a very pleasant dormitory, there are lavatories and lockers, play rooms in the basements for rainy days; and each has a reading-room with a big open fireplace where in the evening the boys can sit and read, or study, or play quiet games, as they wish. Furnished in mission, with attractive pictures on the walls, growing plants and flowers arranged around the room, the place is as cozy and homelike as the best of boys might wish for. At present there are only 170 boys at the institution, but when all the buildings are complete the full capacity will be 900. The city secured the services of Hobart H. Todd as superintendent of the Parental School—a man who has had twenty-five years experience in handling boys, and who is still a good deal of a boy himself. In dealing with the boy Mr. Todd starts out with the idea that he is a natural human being equipped with all the fun-loving tendencies of youth, and not a vicious

The American Pulpit

A SERMON BY

Rev. A. C. DIXON, D.D.*

THE POWER OF SALVATION

TEXT: Isa. 45:22—"Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth."

FIRST of all, we have a personal God whose personality is revealed in Jesus Christ. "Look unto me." The pantheism which teaches that God is everything and everything is God has had no response from this pulpit. God, not a thing, but a Thinker, a Lover, a Ruler, who cares and guides and guards; a personal God made concrete and thinkable to us in Jesus Christ: God come down to our level, that he might lift us to his level.

"God is Spirit;" but our sin-blunted faculties can hardly think pure spirit. When I attempt it, it assumes some sort of misty or ghostly appearance; so God, the infinite Spirit, makes himself thinkable by coming within human compass, with human limitations. The highest thought of man is a perfect man. Try to think something higher and you make it a monster. God puts himself within the compass of our highest thought, "God manifest in the flesh;" and by making himself thinkable and concrete in the Lord Jesus Christ he brings himself into touch with us at every point of our humanity. Charles Haddon Spurgeon was acquainted with Christ. He knew him; he loved him; he walked with him. To him the Lord Jesus Christ was the greatest personality in all the universe.

God Revealed in the Son

"I am God, and there is none else." No pantheon here. Jesus Christ "God over all, blessed for evermore." Satan said, "Disobey, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil;" and he has ever since been trying to make good that promise by deifying humanity. He seems to be succeeding better in this age than ever before. We hear much about the divinity of humanity. But in the vision of this pulpit man has been a lost sinner and Jesus Christ a mighty Saviour, who stands out in solitary grandeur as the Revealer of Father, Son and Spirit. "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." All that there is of God you will find in Jesus Christ. If you want to know God, study Christ. You will see the skirts of his garments in nature. "The heavens declare his glory, and the firmament showeth his handiwork." You can see indications of his wisdom and his benevolence and power as you look about you; but if you want to know God himself, you must see him in Jesus Christ.

A man at the head of a settlement work in Boston informed a ministers' meeting that the members of the settlement were living with their families in the slums, in order that the children of cruel and drunken parents might learn what fatherhood meant, because when you speak to them about the Fatherhood of God they think now of their cruel and drunken fathers. Some one replied, "If you will go down to the slums and preach Jesus Christ for one hour to those slum children, they will know more about the Fatherhood of God than if you were to live with them ten years." In Jesus Christ is fully revealed the tenderness, the sympathy and the love of the Father-heart of God.

The Divine Word

In the next place, we have a speaking God whose voice is heard in Christ. "Thus saith the Lord . . . Look unto Me." "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spoke unto our fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son." One of Mr. Spurgeon's greatest sermons is on "The Speaking Book," God speaking to us through the Bible. "No prophecy came by the will of man, but men spoke from God moved by the Holy Spirit." "The Spirit spoke by the mouth of David," and in these Scriptures this pulpit has always heard the voice of God—the voice of God revealing what sin is and does; the voice of God revealing man and his Saviour; the voice of God in its severity of truth and in its tenderness of love.

Turn to Exodus 17:14, and you will find that God commands Moses to write a book. Then if you will turn to Deuteronomy 31:9 you will find the record that Moses wrote the book as God commanded. Now if you will look down at the 26th verse of that chapter, you will find that the command was to take this book and put it beside the ark of the covenant, the very safest place possible. All this suggests, in the light of the Scriptures I have quoted, that the Bible is literature written at the command of God, under the guidance of God, and preserved by the providential care of God. I wish we had time to speak of the arks in which God has kept the Bible all through the ages; the ark of the manuscripts, two thousand of them; the ark of the translations into almost every language of earth; the ark of the quotations; and, above all, the ark of God's own Church, the hearts of his people.

Science and Religion

When Jesus said, "Search the Scriptures," every Jew to whom he spoke knew what he meant—a body of writings marked off from all other writings as authoritative, written at the command of God, under the guidance of God, and preserved by the providential care of God. And when the Holy Spirit wrote, "All Scripture is God-breathed and is profitable," every Jew to whom he wrote knew what he meant—that every such Scripture came out from God and has in it the breath of God; not only the writers, but the writing inspired. And the man who stood in this pulpit for so many years preached this Scripture with a consciousness that God's life was in it, and that God spake and worked through his living Word.

During Mr. Spurgeon's lifetime there arose a great apostasy in the Church of Christ, founded largely upon what eminent scientists are willing now to admit was a scientific apostasy. Sir Walter Scott had charmed the literary world with his historical romances, full of facts and fascinating fiction. Then came Charles Darwin with two volumes which he entitled The Origin of Species and The Descent of Man, full of facts and fascinating fiction. They were really, though not ostensibly, scientific romances, as the books of Sir Walter Scott were historic romances. Over eight hundred times in these two books occurs the phrase, or its equivalent, "We may well suppose." The central fiction of the whole book, borrowed from the Greek philosophers of five hundred years before Christ, was that all living forms came from one or more primordial germs. It was so fascinating to the scientific, and even the theological mind, that it was accepted as a good basis to work upon, and some theologians becoming a little nervous said, "We must adjust Christianity to all this, or the ark of God is lost." But Charles H. Spurgeon was not swept from his moorings. He stood like Gibraltar on God's everlasting truth, and just let the waves, billow upon billow, surge about him; and now the scientific world is veering round to his position. It has been discovered that embryonic life is not reproductive; that only maturity reproduces itself. Eggs do not hatch eggs. Acorns do not produce acorns. Babies never bear babies. This fact makes impossible the theory that the earliest life was embryonic and immature, unless we are willing to presuppose a million miracles for its preservation.

A Finished Salvation

In the next place, we have a saving God whose salvation is in Christ. "Look unto me and be ye saved;" not save yourself, not help me to save you, but "Look unto me and be ye saved." Charles H. Spurgeon stood for the sovereign grace of God in saving the sinner, that God himself was responsible for salvation, and that we, left to ourselves, should have been lost forever. He quoted more than once, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling;" but he never failed to bring in the next clause, which is so often omitted: "For it is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his own good pleasure." Salvation for us is finished and complete in Jesus Christ; but salvation in us must be completed by co-working with God. The salvation for us is a finished fact. Christ came down from heaven, born of a virgin, crucified on Calvary, raised from the dead, ascended to glory. Through this finished fact salvation becomes a sudden experience. Regeneration is instantaneous. At some tick of the clock, some heart-beat, the soul passes from death unto life, becomes a partaker of the Divine nature, and a child of God. "To as many as received him, to them gave he power to become sons of God;" and it never has been asserted from this pulpit—for the simple reason that it is not true—that God is in any spiritual sense the Father of all men. Our Lord said to the Pharisees, "Ye are of your father the devil and his lusts will ye do." By the power of the Holy Spirit we are born from above, and we become sons of God through Jesus Christ our Lord.

This finished fact for us and this instantaneous experience within us will result in a gradual process. We are to grow in grace and knowle There is a perfect standing before God in Chr but imperfect experience in us. The hyper-holi which claims not only perfect standing before but an absolutely perfect experience has n found footing in this pulpit. We go on to perfec in experience, but there is no "going on to per tion" in Jesus Christ our Lord. Absolutely per in him, we reach on after the perfection of image in us that shall come by and by.

Again, we have revealed in this text an atten God whose attention is through Christ. "Look me," as if to say, "I am God, looking for your l I am God listening to your cry." "Look unto Ours is not a God far away. Our God can before we speak. Ours is a God that can see upward glancing of the eye," and knows the guage of the heart-beat and the heart-br "Look unto me." "Look unto me for salvat Then look unto me for comfort and guidance."

Salvation to the Uttermost

Finally, we have a God whose universality i Christ. "Look unto me and be ye saved, all ends of the earth;" all the extremes of earth, the best and the worst, the most igno and the most cultured, the youngest and the old the Jew and the Gentile, all nations, all cla "Look unto me as revealed in the Son of Man;" son of a Jew; nor of a Roman; nor of a Greek. one nationality, but all nationalities. In his v the blood of the whole human race. "Son of M Son of humanity, a Saviour suited to all. Su universal Saviour has been preached from this pit during the past fifty years.

We have had a glimpse of God as personal, tary, speaking, saving, attentive and univer God once said to his people, "Take the trumpet sound it on the Great Day of Atonement." sound of that trumpet meant liberty to the s and enrichment to the impoverished. The slav the sound of the trumpet was set free. Are an you enslaved by habit, enslaved by sin, enslave selfishness, enslaved by avarice, enslaved by wo liness, enslaved by environment, enslaved by the of man? I would like to sound the trumpet will make you free. It is the joyful sound w proclaims full salvation through the atoning b of Jesus Christ. Every day is now a Great Da Atonement for all who will "Behold the Lam God that taketh away the sin of the world."

One other effect of the trumpet was to res lost possessions. The man whose property had sold got it back. The man who had lost the tage of his fathers received it again. The man had been driven out from his home by adve returned to it. There were family reunions, the poor became rich in restored possessions. you look back upon the last fifty years how n have you lost? You remember "the good o of the past," and you praise God for them. W made those days good? You had a marve preacher with a voice like an angel's harp, wi heart like a furnace of fire glowing with love God and man, with the loyalty of the old- prophet. His like will not appear again. But had him here by my side and could ask, ' Spurgeon, what do you think was the secret of success?" you know him well enough to tell what he would say, "It was not my voice, nor personality, nor my genius. It was God Almi in the power of his Spirit through Jesus Christ Lord." And he would put the crown of glory the Head that wore the crown of thorns.

What have you lost? Have you lost the spir prayer? Have you lost the intercession that sists and expects? Have you lost your joy? you singing,

> Where is the blessedness I knew
> When first I saw the Lord?

Have you lost your peace? Have you lost your sion for souls? Have you lost your enthusias Christian work? Have you lost your power in vice? May God bring every one of you back your God-given possessions. May the lost spir prayer, the lost love of the lost, the lost peace lost joy, the lost power, be restored.

May the trumpet of Jubilee sound in every giving liberty and enrichment to all until the trump shall sound, and we shall pass from the itations of time into the liberty of eternity.

* Preached in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, London.

MY CANDLE-SHINE

OW swift the windy evening slips
Unseen, beyond the night's dark line:
hrough autumn mists wan starlight drips, ut on his silent, pictured lips
Plays soft and sweet my candle-shine.

is living looks, his wonted smile
Illume and warm my lonely room, nd faint, far echoes reconcile he striving wind and rain, the while Remembered laughter thrills the gloom.

hose live who thought they loved him dear;
Yet, gone, how soon they have forgot;
h, cherished, changeless, year by year,
is lips return my candle's cheer;
Like phantom fires, their place is not.

heir stars are set: O light, how brief!
Beams sweet and clear my candle-shine.
ow tell me, is it jealous grief
y tie to deem most strong, most lief,
Or is it mother-love divine?

y, let me hold my dear-bought hope,
Though all the stars to doom are driven;
ternity hath wondrous scope;
y candle-shine of love shall grope
Till safe to me my boy is given.

City that Lives on Flowers

By Mary Gay Robinson

E take an early train from Nice to Grasse, France, and ride the rty-one miles, taking three hours to ch it. Grasse is perched on the side Mount Rocagnon. Grasse lives and athes on flowers and sleeps on beds roses, but withal leads a busy work-day life. The working day is from en in the morning to seven at ht, with an hour at noon for dinner. One-third of the world's perfumery made at Grasse. The banker thschild has built a villa and owns rt of the pine forest in the suburb the city. Roses, jasmines, tube-es, orange, cassia, jonquils, ver-a, heliotrope, violets, and other wers here do not waste their fra-ance on the desert air, but bloom d die to live again and send their eet perfume to all the world. Wag-s loaded with flowers are coming in day long from every direction to pply the seventy distillers; and ten ousand persons are employed in the lustry, one-half natives and the rest edmontese. The value of the trade one million dollars. During part of e year, one hundred and fifty-two ns of flowers are used every day.

We visit Bruno Court, once a Domin-n convent, but since 1812 a perfume ctory. We are shown into a large om, the convent refectory, where the wers are brought in and weighed. takes twelve thousand kilos of roses make one kilo of essence. At long bles, women and girls are picking off e stems. In another room the rose aves are put into clarified, boiling rk and beef fat and left for three urs; then into fat a second time for lf an hour; then the leaves are ken out and the fat is used to make ap. In winter they make olive oil ap.

The jasmines, jonquils and tube-ses are put in cold fat for three onths, putting in fresh flowers ery day, two months for tuberoses d two months for jonquils. They ll this raw material, as they call it, other manufacturers to absorb in cohol for the making of perfume. his process is also carried on at rasse. The Irresistible Force

By EUGENE THWING

THE man of force is always in demand. Every department of the world's activities is calling to him and offering him the chief place. More than all else, the world's weakness and need reach out appealing hands to him crying, night and day, "Come and help; come and lift us up; conditions of life are crushing us; we are not able to change them; we want strong men to take our part."

"Quit you like men, be strong!" therefore, has always been among the most stimulating and impelling commands to healthy, ambitious, active manhood. It is natural to love strength and force. Conquerers in every age and in every department of life have been hailed king, have won the plaudits of the multitude, have earned the best rewards of this life and the life to come.

Every moment of physical life, of religious or business life, is continuous warfare. Without fighting nothing lives and moves and has its being. Without fighting there is no achievement, no advance. Death begins the instant fighting ends. Even the tenderest and gentlest influences in life assert themselves only through some form of silent conflict, the overcoming of one force by a greater. Everywhere is strength desired. All mankind longs for it. Strength, power, the force that will overcome, that will win victories—it is the one thing we all reach for greedily.

CONSIDER how strange it is that this one thing so universally admired and sought after should not be recognized by many who most loudly profess their appreciation of it. Every day, everywhere, we find the noisy, strutting fool masquerading in the garment of the king and receiving the homage of the eager crowd, while the king himself, in all his dignity and power, is ignored or scorned. The thing that makes the greatest show of strength may be set down as weakness, for weakness is fond of masquerade. Real power has no need of display, hiding itself, rather, behind its works. The power that is unseen is mightier than that which is seen.

GOODNESS is the one militant, invincible force in the world. The truth of this is so obvious that the statement, set down in black and white, appears almost witless. Yet there are men standing in the community who do not hesitate to express their contempt for goodness as an equipment for the stern realities of life. It is their outspoken opinion that goodness is synonymous with weakness, with a sort of anæmic religious aloofness from much of the real and earnest, the active and strenuous, the immediate and imperative affairs of life. Goodness cannot succeed in business, because the competition is too keen and unscrupulous. Politics has its sign boldly displayed: "Abandon goodness, all who enter here." Let any who cares for goodness stick to the church and its works of devotion and charity, but beware engaging in the daily struggle with strong men who trample on the weak and say it's the survival of the fittest.

So it happens that very often the champions themselves of goodness are misled and fail to recognize where their real strength lies. They take to themselves the weapons of the world and seek to belabor mankind into goodness. Editors and reformers hold up the horrid evils of society with zestful rage in view of the multitude. They rush to the attack with mighty club or scolding pen. They anathematize the wrong doer and seek to crush him with the scorn and anger of the people.

Perhaps this manner of warfare does accomplish somewhat against the intrenched evil in the world. I hope so, but I fear most of its fury is lost in its own outpouring, and that when the sensation it creates for the moment is past, the assault is forgotten. It is not the most effective plan for gaining permanent results. The same methods are used in some homes, but the wayward child who would not be controlled was rather hardened and driven farther away from goodness than made better. Think carefully: Do you know of a single case where the evil in politics, or business, or in an individual has really been eradicated by exposure, or denunciation, or punishment? They are a necessary accompaniment of evil, and they may cause it to hide and remain inactive for a while, but they do not destroy it.

AS ELIJAH stood upon the mount before the Lord, "a great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks," but "the Lord was not in the wind." Tumult and smashing, and rending, and blowing hard may go on with zealous persistence, and if that be all, the crusade against evil will fail. There is just one, and only one, complete, invincible, unquestionably sure plan of campaign which cannot fail. It is strong, militant, destructive and at the same time constructive, and it comes from the highest possible authority. It has been employed times without number, always with success. It gives the fullest play for all the vigorous, masculine qualities and for the tenderest influences of womanhood. Evil will tremble and flee before it after laughing to scorn the thunderings of the tumult makers. Mighty charges of dynamite may fail to break the grip of the ice king on the cataract, but the quiet, smiling power of the sun conquers him completely. The coldest, hardest hearts, which have defied every force of law and punishment, are constantly yielding to the gentle power of love and human sympathy. The whole plan of campaign is summed up in the four words of command: "Overcome evil with good."

"QUIT you like men, be strong!" "Overcome evil with good." The two are like one command. Overcoming means inevitably a struggle and a victory. It is likely to be a very silent struggle, with no sensational display of strength, but power there must be. And the greatest power will be found in the "still, small voice."

The men and women who combat the evil in the world with the positive, persuasive, all conquering power of good are doing two things: destroying the disease and adding to the health and beauty of the world, both at the same time. Wreck and ruin are not spread by their victorious progress, but the wilderness is made to blossom as the rose. These crusaders have no time for anathemas nor for sounding the alarm. They sing as they go, eager "to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim liberty to the captive, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound, . . . to comfort all that mourn; to appoint unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness."

LOOK TO THE HILLS!

WE SEE some soul, more dear than life,
Sinking in waves of sin and strife,
Blown by the winds from our control,
Farther and farther from the goal;
What shall we do when hope is gone?
Look to the hills! Pray on! Pray on!

When in the hour of pains and grief
Our hearts, while longing for relief,
Are filled with dread lest on the morrow
Will come a deeper, keener sorrow—
What shall we do when strength is gone?
Look to the hills! Pray on! Pray on!

Though oft the waiting time seems long,
Be patient. Sing a sweeter song.
God's time, his way, is always best.
Trust, fully trust and leave the rest.
His promise stands. Bid doubt begone!
Look to the hills! Pray on! Pray on!

We well can claim his promise rare,
And wait the answer to our prayer.
With thankful hearts we still can say,
"God's answer may be on the way."
We shall win out if faith is strong.
Look to the hills! Pray on! Pray on!

God answers prayer. When in our need
His promises our lips can plead,
Our hands reach out to clasp his hand,
Our hearts respond to his command,
Assurance comes. The burden's gone.
Look to the hills! Pray on! Pray on!

Keep on the Right Track

FAR down in the valley I see a train speeding on to its destination. The engineer, from the beginning of the trip, is endeavoring to accomplish the object which was entrusted to him, i. e., to bring his train to its destination. Despite his controlling power over the engine, it occasionally leaves the track or gets on the wrong one, sometimes resulting in its complete destruction. If destroyed, it would never reach the proper destination. If it leaves the track and receives only a slight damage, it can be repaired and continued through to the destination. If it gets on the wrong track, it can soon be put on the right one again.

We are also bound for a destination. What destination do you wish to reach when your journey on this earth is at an end? Jesus Christ should be our Engineer. He is constantly endeavoring to bring us to our proper destination, which is heaven. Despite the sweet remembrance of our Engineer, and his sufferings to save us, we often leave the track. In such a case, we could never reach our proper destination. If we get on the wrong track, why not get on the right one before it is too late? Every day we should ask to have our fire replenished with faith, spirit, truth, etc., in order to keep going on the track that leads to heaven. H. I. P.

The Italian Flag Now Flies at Tripoli

Gun Drill on a Turkish Warship

An Italian Gun Crew at Work

THOUGH actual fighting is still in progress between Italy and Turkey in the Mediterranean, some hope is expressed that this war may prove the shortest on record. The London dispatches state on good authority that Italy will accept terms of settlement based on an Italian protectorate of Tripoli similar to that of England in Egypt and that she will in addition to this pay Turkey a cash indemnity. The European powers now seem convinced that the embroilment of these two nations in the Mediterranean will not fulfil its promise of starting hostilities between any of the other nations.

Neither Italy nor Turkey appears to be desirous of forcing the fighting. It is the opinion of naval experts that the Italian squadrons have been warned from Rome to carry on the war with as little bloodshed as possible. There is little doubt but that the Italian fleet which chased the Turks from Beirut to the Dardanelles could have captured and sunk many, if not all, of the Turkish ships. Italy's object in this leniency would appear to be the prevention of action which would arouse the bitterness of anti-Christian feeling among the Mohammedans and possibly lead to the declaration of a "holy war." Turkey has shown no desire to take the aggressive part, as her naval forces have suffered most severely from the activities of the Italians. The state of Turkey's political affairs is also wielding a large influence over her conduct of the war. The Young Turk party has been removed from power and Said Pasha, who was Grand Vizier in the government of the deposed Sultan, was recalled to take charge of affairs. Such was the division of opinion that it was with difficulty that he formed a new cabinet, the majority of which is made up of members of the Committee of Union and Progress.

Now that the occupation of Tripoli is accomplished, neither Italy nor Turkey has anything to gain by prolonging the war. Turkey cannot reach out to deal an effective blow at her opponent, and her resistance in Tripoli must ultimately disappear, as Italy's command of the sea will quite effectively prevent the forwarding of reinforcements. Kaiser Wilhelm of Germany is exerting every possible effort in urging the Turks to accept the loss of Tripoli and make peace on the basis of a money indemnity. It is also believed in European diplomatic circles that the Kaiser has offered Turkey German protection in the future if she will accept these terms. The most serious promise of international complication arose over the operation of that section of the Italian fleet which was commanded by the Duca degli Abruzzi off the city of Prevesa. Austria became alarmed at the activity which was there displayed, and demanded of Italy a reconciliation of her movements in the Adriatic with her former promises that the status quo of the Balkan States was to be carefully preserved throughout the present struggle. Italy immediately denied that she had landed troops at Prevesa, and although the Duke continued his operations at the mouth of the Adriatic Sea, he withdrew the ultimatum in which he had declared that he would immediately bombard Prevesa unless the Vali of the city ordered from its harbor the Turkish vessels which had there taken refuge. The operations of the Duca degli Abruzzi have gained for him the greatest popularity at home. On October 5 his flotilla, which had been in action the previous day clearing Turkish torpedo boats from the Adriatic, arrived at Taranto. A magnificent reception was tendered the Duke by the enthusiastic people of the city, who carried him about the streets upon their shoulders in triumphal procession.

Montenegro, Servia and Bulgaria, all of which have interests in the Dalmatian Peninsula, have declared their intention of remaining entirely neutral. The attitude of Greece has been one of considerable fear lest Turkey should attempt to make good her loss of Tripoli by the forcible annexation of Thessaly. Though alarmed at the Turkish military preparations along her borders, Greece has accepted at face value the statement made officially by Turkey that no hostile interpretation should be put upon these movements of troops, as they were connected entirely and only with the present state of war with Italy.

Turkey's Minister of War

Rear-Admiral Aubrey
Commanding the Italian Fleet at Tripoli

General Spingardi
The Italian Minister of War

The Italian authorities have continued to exercise the strictest censors over the news dispatches and their transmission from the city of Tripoli as w as from most of the important points along the Italian coast where the mo ization of troops and the movement of ships have been taking place. Af several days of conflicting reports as to the operations of the fleet under command of Rear-Admiral Aubrey, the news of the Italian bombardment occupation of some of the fortifications of the city of Tripoli was confirm On the afternoon of October 3 the warships drew up before the port of Tri in regular battle formation. The destroyers cruised rapidly about betw the warships and the city, while another squadron was spread out in the r to protect it from surprise by the Turkish torpedo boats, which were known be somewhere at sea just off the African coast. The time limits which h been allowed the Turkish garrison having expired, a fi demand for surrender was made. As this was refused by Turkish commander, the bombardment of the city was beg

The section of the fleet under the command of Vice-Admi Faravelli was ordered to direct its guns only at the ou fortifications, so as to prevent the destruction of the prope of non-combatants. The fire of the fleet was answered by guns from the Turkish fortifications with but little eff The Turkish guns were unable to get the Italians wit range, and the latter merely stood in the offing and destro the defenses without even using their largest and most p erful guns. During the firing that afternoon the lightho of the port was destroyed. As this was of the greatest to the Italians themselves, Vice-Admiral Faravelli imm diately sent a landing party ashore to reconstruct it i temporary way. Landing parties of officers and mari which investigated the fortifications that the Turks h abandoned found that the fire of the modern artillery h everywhere taken full effect. The abandoned bodies of th artillerymen were found in the ruins of one of the forts.

The attack was resumed on the following day, and the sa care was exercised to confine the zone of fire to the fortifi tions and the palace of the Vali. On the second day of bombardment the Turkish garrison still occupied a posit behind some of the forts and responded to the fire of Italians with a few shells which fell far short of their ma The churches, mosques and chief public bu ings of the city have not been damaged by shells of the attacking fleet. A few priv dwellings in the immediate vicinity of Vali's palace were burned when it was stroyed, but other than this no private pr erty has been demolished. Before comme ing the bombardment the detachments fr the warships removed all mines from harbor and made a careful revision of hydrographic chart in order to insure safety of the transports.

Although the Italian flag now occupies prominent position on the water front, part the city is still in the possession of the Tu ish troops. Messages from the officers Admiral Faravelli's squadron state that far as they have been able to learn, the ga son of Tripoli is gradually retiring to interior of the country. Their first m after leaving the demolished defenses was entrench themselves upon the outski of the city in the hope that with the assistance of the Arabs they would able to withstand the attacks of the Italians. According to some of most recent dispatches the conduct of the Arabs has provided one of the gre est surprises of the entire war. It was expected that they would rise large numbers to the assistance of the Turks; instead of this they have gree the arrival of the Italians with little or no show of hostility.

According to the official Italian reports fifty-seven Turkish steamers, yac and smaller craft have been captured by the fleet at sea or seized in Itali ports. The most authoritative Turkish dispatches claim the capture destruction of only three Italian vessels. Actuated by what must be nea akin to panic, Turkey on October 7 addressed a passionately worded protest the European powers, begging them to induce Italy to desist.

A Blow at World-Peace

HOW lightly kings and cabinets hold the world's peace; how swift they are to repudiate their royal pledges as given in arbitration treaties, and to ignore conciliation tribunals when the great territorial grab game invites them; how cheaply they value human lives, we may now see in the unseemly haste of Italy to begin war against Turkey. Very slight was the pretext. There was nothing in it that could not have been carried to The Hague. And now we have the clashing of armies, the sinking of ships, demolished buildings, and the slaughter of men, many of them mere lads, for the glory of a monarch who is carried away by the desire to increase the prestige of his navy and to add to his territorial possessions by force at any cost.

Italy is a nation with a great and glorious past. Turkey has been a cruel scourge and a tyrant throughout her long history. To-day, she is an anachronism—an obstacle in the path of human progress. But Italy, in yielding to the lust of conquest and rushing into war on a slight and unworthy pretext, has dimmed the lustre of her splendid record. Had she carried the whole case against Turkey to The Hague, she would not only have had justice, but she would have added to her own fame and given a noble example to other nations. She missed a great opportunity. Her plunge into war has been formally censured by the Interparliamentary Union; it is condemned by public opinion here and abroad, and even by many of her own subjects. It has been fittingly characterized as a reversion to barbarism.

We have no admiration for the Turk. Those who recall the savage massacres of the defenseless Armenians and the repeated outbursts of fanatical oppression, must long ago have come to the conclusion that Turkey, by her own acts, has put herself outside the pale of public sympathy. There have been times when united Christendom has fervently prayed that Turkey might be obliterated as a punishment for her crimes. But Turkish policies have been materially improved under the new and liberal régime. The Turk has appreciably mended his ways since the day of Abdul Hamid. Sultan Mehmed was willing to arbitrate the Tripolitan dispute, and it should have been arbitrated without resort to violence. Now, the whole Mediterranean is a scene of strife. Europe as far north as the Balkans may yet be involved. Should the Turks proclaim a "holy war," then this most unholy war may reach far beyond its present limits, and cause both Germany and England to regret that they did not interfere while the opportunity was open. War has been called "the game of kings," but it is a barbarous, unchristian and cruel one, with human lives as the pawns on the board. In this age of enlightenment and progress, when the people of every land have been hoping and praying for international peace, those in power who wantonly make war incur a frightful responsibility.

The Austin Tragedy

COULD the great dam at Austin, Pa., which gave way with such disastrous results, causing the death of nearly one hundred persons, have been made safe? If so, whose was the blame that its notoriously unsafe condition was neglected? It would seem that some time ago, according to reports, there was a structural movement in the great mass of concrete which should have received immediate attention. Instead, it was left unheeded, jeopardizing the lives of all the dwellers in the valley. The consulting engineer of the Department of Water Supply states that he recommended certain improvements which would have made the dam sound and safe. It needed radical treatment, as it was already sliding. Twenty-five to thirty thousand dollars, he estimates, would have covered the cost of reinforcing walls, but these recommendations were unheeded. Meanwhile the contractor who built the dam, being fully aware of its critical condition, since it had begun to slide, was anxious to begin reparation of the work. He urged his views, but nothing was done. There was criminal neglect somewhere and it should not be a difficult matter to find the responsible persons. Nothing can call back the lives that have been sacrificed; but it is due to their memory, to the impoverished survivors and to the good name of the State, that the investigation should be thorough and the punishment adequate.

A Gubernatorial Hymn-Critic

THERE are doubtless many good people who will fully approve of the criticism of Governor Woodrow Wilson, which he passed upon modern hymnology at a recent meeting of Sunday School superintendents in Trenton, N. J. Six thousand persons had united in singing the hymn "Beautiful Isle of Somewhere" at a gathering that afternoon, and the Governor, having heard them, told the superintendents very frankly that he considered the hymn "silly and meaningless." "Sunday Schools," he said, "were a means of educating the young; but much of the present-day methods of teaching he characterized as unsuitable and ineffective." He believed in teaching from the Bible and in singing the old sacred songs, but there were many hymns nowadays that contained neither poetry nor sense. Any one who turns over the leaves of the average hymn-book must agree with the Governor that there are too many vague and meaningless verses set to music that is about as destitute of merit as the words themselves and often hardly a single remove from rag-time. Congregational hymn-singing has declined in many churches, and the praise part of the service is becoming little more than brilliant exercise for the choir, in which the congregation has no part. We have sat in churches where more than one-half the service was musical and all the congregation had to do was to recite the Lord's Prayer and the creed and join in the doxology. It is a matter for regret that in many denominations, the old-style hymn-singing has been practically discontinued. Praise should be an important part of worship and the people should have an opportunity to "lift their voices," even if it should involve the sacrifice of a few showy selections by the choir. There is nothing that warms up an audience like good congregational singing. We believe that more souls have been won by the power of sacred song than most pastors seem to be aware of.

A Continent-wide Revival

IT IS well to aim high. Especially to aim high in the things that relate to the spiritual life. In the proposed concerted effort to create a continent-wide revival, which has been launched under the direction of able leaders, co-operating with the Protestant churches throughout the country, and known as the "Men and Religion Forward Movement," there are many things that give encouragement to hope for a substantial spiritual result.

There are certain aspects of the new movement that will commend themselves to the average Christian and especially to the churches. There are to be no emotional or heartrending appeals; the spectacular methods usually employed by evangelists will not be followed. All the power, influence and talent at command will, however, be exerted to impress upon the people of this nation the fact that we are living under social, religious and even business conditions that cannot be fully reconciled with the claim that we are a Christian people. It will be an effort all along the line to draw the nation nearer to God; to glorify Christ and to magnify the Church as his appointed instrument for the world's salvation. At the bottom of all our relations should be the underlying bedrock of Christian principles. Business is in itself, in the highest sense, a great moral question, and what is right between man and man must, in the ultimate, be determined by what is right between God and man. We have come to the cross-roads in our religious national experience, where we must decide between right and wrong, God and mammon, justice and injustice, good business and evil business. There can be no middle ground.

Every Christian man and woman must pray for the success of this great movement and give it the fullest co-operation. In the history of past revivals, there never was an organization of such workers. Elijah on Carmel withstood all the forces of evil single-handed; Wesley was almost alone; Luther for a time was a solitary figure against the world; Moody was a blazing torch, and the same might be said of many others who, by the very intensity of their spiritual convictions and the power of their inspired eloquence, moved the multitudes. Efficient leadership in any great campaign is half the battle—sometimes the whole. We trust that this new movement may be so led that it will develop all the advantages that come from the personality of men of consecrated ability. We shall pray for its success.

The Flying Ladies

DISSATISFIED with their triumphs on Mother Earth, the women are now emulating the feats of men in their flights skyward. Some of them have and others in Europe have shown wonderful skill in the management of the aeroplane. Several of these ambitious ladies have recorded their impressions of aerial navigation. One declares that the danger of flying have been greatly exaggerated and that any one can fly who can run an automobile. She admits, however, the risk in yielding to the temptation to "dip" and "spiral," and holds that if the flyer would abjure tricks in the upper air, and give the same steady attention to work that is expected of a railroad engineer, there would be few fatalities. Another writes of the "intoxication of flight," and predicts its increasing popularity. She adds, "Many of us will perish, but that prospect will not dismay the braver spirits." The truth is that the aeroplane is still in its experimental stage. Every week brings a record of casualties. Still, there are some encouraging indications of useful progress, one being the utilization of the 'plane as a letter-carrier. Meanwhile, let us hope that the flying ladies will not come by any mishaps and that they may enjoy their exhilarating experience without any of its more serious attendant dangers.

Life Transformed by a Sermon

On the 30th day of last May, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD saved my life. This will perhaps lead you to understand my love and thankfulness to your magazine. Never shall I be able to forget that horrible day in Spokane where my despair had reached its boiling point and where I found myself on the verge of death. But by a strange turn of fate, just then, at the supreme moment, the mail-carrier brought me THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I hardly thought of reading it at that time, but somehow I opened it and my eyes fell upon the sermon of Rev. Hugh Black, D.D., "The Bondage of Fear" (Text: Ps. 56: 3, "What time I am afraid I will trust in Thee"). In my ordeal I had forgotten all about God; but this sermon not only reminded me of him, but it at once changed my desperate resolution and made my heart lighter. Now that months have elapsed since this terrible experience, I often ask myself, "Was it really but a mere chance, or, as I have said, a queer turn of fate, that brought me THE CHRISTIAN HERALD just at that desperate moment? No, a thousand times no! It was God who put me under the ordeal for my own good, and who sent me the strength to bear it. A.

Ship's Mastery of Sea

It is a marvel in these days of marvels that the Olympic did not sink immediately with fearful loss of life when the British cruiser Hawke tore [illegible] a monstrous hole in her hull. With a list of passengers and crew large enough to people a small [illegible] and herds and flocks and provisions enough to supply them, the White Star liner set out from Southampton for New York when the collision made a hole in her twenty by seventy feet. Captain E. J. Smith closed the water-tight bulkheads and no life was lost. Dr. E. M. Bownton, of Scranton, Pa., and Helmuth Scharff, of Johannesburg, would very likely have been killed had they not just left their stateroom a moment before for dinner. The Hawke's nose went through the place where their stateroom was. The Olympic, which is the pride of the ocean, has by her escape from destruction proven herself also monarch of the sea. In earlier times, and not so very far back either, one going across the ocean thought it the most prudent thing to make a will before going, and ask special prayer of relatives and friends for a safe return, so many were the perils of the deep. Modern shipbuilding has reduced these dangers to a minimum. The watertight bulkheads and other inventions have reduced the liability to wreckage on the ocean to the smallest degree. When a ship so terribly torn can allow its passengers to go on with an interrupted voyage, and can go back under her own steam to Southampton, many think that they would be as safe or safer on board such a vessel as on the land in a community with many railroad crossings or trolley lines or much traffic. Transportation on land has been furnished with many safety appliances, but they have hardly kept pace with those on the ocean. The perils and wreckage of early sea navigation is thus described by the Apostle:

And when neither sun nor star in many days appeared, and no small tempest lay on us, all hope that we should be saved was then taken away. (Acts 27:20.)

Athen's Tribute to Christ

It would be difficult to find a more exquisitely beautiful tribute to Christ and to his influence in the world through the lives of his disciples, than that of Adachi Kinnosuke in the Century Magazine. He says: "This is not a Christian view of the work. I am a Japanese by birth — a mere heathen. It is therefore the impression of an outsider pure and simple, and these I know to be facts. Forty-odd years ago, at every gate to both the Flower Capital of the Mikado and Yedo, city of the Shogun, and at many of the entrances to the towns and villages of Nippon, there stood a large notice-board. It was official. In bold, heavy, black, fat strokes was the following, translated into English: "The evil sect Kirishitan (Christian) is strictly forbidden as hitherto." To-day you may see a few of these old notice-boards, but you will have to go to the Tokio Museum to find them. Thirty-five years ago there were eleven baptized Protestant Christians. To-day there are seventy thousand of them in Japan: they own 600 churches; in their Sunday Schools they teach 100,000 children. Fifty years ago there was no such expression as "religious freedom" in the entire range of Nippon literature. To-day the phrase has been written into the constitution of the land. Less than fifty years ago, if you wished to have a free fight on the spot all you had to do was to call a gentleman a 'Yaso' — that is to say "Jesus." And to-day? Admiral Ariu and many other officers of the navy and army are proud to be called 'Yaso.' The editors of some of the metropolitan dailies are Christian. The writer then refers to distinguished statesmen who are followers of Christ, and mentions the fact that the Emperor of Japan contributes regularly to the support of the Young Men's Christian Association." The author then devotes the rest, which is the most, of the article to proving conclusively that the revolution in the civilization of Japan which has taken place within a generation has largely been the result of the able, modest, sincere, Christ-like spirit of the teaching and lives of the missionaries of the Cross. The writer says: "The thing that made us change our mind was the life lived among us by the gentlemen who came to us in the name of Jesus, their Master. And for this reason: many of the missionaries who came to Japan in those early days were scholars long before they were missionaries, and they were Men (and all the capitals in the language cannot possibly do them justice) long before they were scholars." The article includes this quotation from the address of Count Okuma, not a Christian, at an anniversary: "I came in contact with and received great impulses from some of the missionaries of that early period—particularly from Dr. Verbeck, my teacher. I can never forget the great and virtuous influence of the man. In everything he did his Christlike spirit was revealed. Only by the coming of the West in its missionary representation and by the spreading of the Gospel did the nation enter upon world-wide thoughts and world-wide work." The symbols of the establishment of Christ's kingdom are not the hum of factories, nor the scream of whistles, nor rattle of wagon wheels, nor rumbling of railway trains; they are not the tramp of soldiers, nor blowing of bugles, nor flashing of swords, nor booming of cannon, nor shouts of a victorious army; they are not the red lightning out of the black cloud with the awful crash; the real symbols of the progress of Christ's kingdom are the seed sown, covering the earth with blossoms and harvests; they are the dawn scattering away the darkness of ignorance and sin and calling up all living creatures to service and to song. They carried to them the life of Christ, which is the light of the world. They obeyed to the minutest detail the command of the Master:

Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven. (Matt. 5:16.)

Child Dies of Grief

Mr. and Mrs. John Kourhi were driving to the village of Matteawan, N. Y., when a large touring car struck the rear of their wagon, throwing the wife out and badly injuring her. She was picked up by the autoists and hurried in their machine to the Highland Hospital. Her injuries were not fatal. Mr. Kourhi was unhurt. When the news of the accident was told to Adelia Kourhi, the daughter of eight, in her home, she began to cry violently and said, "Then my mama is killed." Before any one could pacify her, and tell her that her mother would be home well in a few days, she fainted away and died of a broken heart. The affection of this sweet little girl for her mother was pathetic and beautiful in the extreme. She may have had a weak heart, but it was evidently her strong love for the mother and the deep sorrow at the thought of her death that took her away. There are some bad children, ungrateful and disloyal to their parents, and the juvenile courts reveal most shocking sins and crimes on the part of very young boys and girls; and yet the love of little Adelia Kourhi for her mother represents the love of the average child for its parents. Christianity creates and enjoins the highest reverence and deepest affection of children for their parents.

Children, obey your parents in the Lord; for this is right. (Eph. 6:1.)

Read Bible Sixty Times

Mrs. Phœbe Powelson, who died at her home in Stamford, Conn., the other day, had the reputation of being the most devoted and well-informed Bible student in the community. She had read God's Book from cover to cover sixty times. It is reported that at the age of ten years she had committed to memory several thousand verses of the Scripture. She read almost no other book, claiming that she found it a library of truth to her. Many of the ablest scholars have testified to the unspeakable value of the Bible as a literary volume, and millions know by experience what a fountain of spiritual truth it is. Mrs. Powelson could have read other good books to advantage and not neglected her Bible, but the one who reads a thousand volumes and has left out the Word of God has not read as much as the woman who read nothing else. In these days, when in some churches and Sunday Schools there is so much preaching and teaching about the Bible, it is not a bad thing to emphasize the preaching and teaching of the Bible itself. The constant prayer of the woman as she read the Bible through sixty times was:

Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law. (Ps. 119:18.)

New Gold-Field Discovery

By a telegram from St. Johns, Newfoundland, it is learned that the little sealing steamer Kite entered the harbor after a three months' voyage to northern Labrador and to the uncharted and rock-bound waste of Baffin Land. One of the sailors on the Kite was on shore leave, and in a communicative moment exhibited a three-ounce nugget of almost virgin gold which he said he had dug out of a vein with a pocket knife while on the voyage. It was learned that the men had not gone on a trading trip at all, as was supposed, but in search of gold on Baffin's waste, and that they had brought back quartz rock, sand and mineral formations indicating a rich new gold-field. The placer stuff they brought back was a quantity of gravel which was said to average a quarter of an ounce of gold to a pound of pannings, the richest find that man has known since the discovery of the scattered pockets of California. R. S. Elmsley of Ottawa and Richard White of St. Johns, who chartered the Kite, located claims on the Brevort and Salma rivers, and expect to return with full equipment of machinery for placer and quartz mining when the ice breaks in the spring. In the description of the Garden of Eden there is mention made of a rich gold-field in a river bed:

And the name of the first is Pison; that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; and the gold of that land is God. (Gen. 2:11, 12.)

The Ruins of Austin's Homes When the Flood Had Passed

THE small army of volunteer rescuers and State laborers who were called to search for the dead and injured or to remove the mass of wreckage which encumbered the streets of the shattered town of Austin, Pa., faced a more gigantic task than they had at first anticipated. Only a few hours after the disaster they attacked the débris that filled the southern end of the valley where Freeman's Run Creek comes down from the Alleghanies at the north and which had formerly held the main part of the town. Here all that had been the pleasant homes of some three thousand people lay in an indescribably tangled mass along the hillsides. Where Main Street once stood, the brick houses remained, but they were shattered and rent, and in front of them were piled masses of lumber and gables of houses. The stream which did all the damage runs at will across the whole plain, and the iron bridge which once spanned it at Main Street is marked only by its stone abutments.

Searching for Valuables in the Ruins of Their Homes

Below Main Street, at the turn of the valley, piles of lumber smouldered for days after the disaster. Not a vestige of a house remains, and the force of the flood which swept over the railroad yards before the flames fell on it was marked by an overturned locomotive and heavy car wheels carried far down the stream.

Though the first estimate of the number of fatalities was happily reduced by about half, the scenes in the stricken town were heartrending. For three days those who had lost members of their families watched the workers with frenzied eagerness. Many were so dulled by the magnitude of the loss that they seemed almost helpless in the midst of the devastation.

What added much to the grief of the people was the feeling that many lives might have been saved if only people had understood the warning that was given them. Harry Davis, an engineer, was the man who first sounded the alarm. He saw the dam give away, and ran to a road house. There he called up Lena Binkey, the girl at the telephone central, and cried: "The dam's burst; give the alarm."

"Oh, quit your kidding," replied the girl, and for a moment did nothing.

Then she called up the Standard Kindling Wood Works, but her message was taken as referring to a fire alarm. So instead of the prolonged whistle that all the village knew was the signal to take to the hills, several short blasts were blown which was the fire alarm. When she realized that her message had been misunderstood the girl called as many as she could on the telephone, then rushed into the street shouting her warning to as many as she could make hear her. It was only after a frantic run that she reached the hillside in time to save her own life.

Three miles down the stream was Costello, a town of five hundred inhabitants and about fifty houses. The valley is narrow, and it was certain that the flood could find no outlet, and would sweep down on it with almost as resistless a force as that which had destroyed Austin. The people were as much in danger, and no warning could be given by telephone, as the wires were down. In this emergency Herbert Young, who worked for the Emporium Lumber Company, sprang on his bicycle and rode for his life and the lives of five hundred down the rough mountain trail. He reached the town just in time, for the residents could barely reach the hills before the flood swept through the village and destroyed it.

Assistance from the nearby towns and villages reached Austin within an hour of the passing of the flood. The State of Pennsylvania immediately dispatched a detachment of constabulary to preserve order and lend what aid they could. Trains of workmen, clothing and provisions were rushed to the scene, and offers of help came from many parts of the country, but Governor Tener, who went as quickly as possible to the devastated section, announced that the State would look after the needy without calling upon outsiders.

About sixty bodies have been recovered from the wreckage and there are about fifteen people still to be accounted for, according to the more or less accurate census by which the casualties were checked off. The victims of the catastrophe were of all ages, ranging from mere infants to persons of advanced years. As many of the townspeople set off to the homes of friends in the surrounding country before any reckoning was made there has been difficulty in ascertaining the exact number of the missing. The State authorities are clearing the site of the town, though many are confident that Austin will never be rebuilt.

Deputy Attorney-General W. M. Hargest is representing the Commonwealth at the inquest into the Austin disaster. Attorney-General Bell directed Mr. Hargest to go to the scene and extend what aid could be given by the State's legal department.

Farley Gannett, engineer of the State Water Supply Commission, has returned to Philadelphia from Austin, and submitted a report to the commission, which met on the following Thursday. Mr. Gannett made a preliminary report on the disaster, but it did not give causes, simply stating what occurred.

"I made studies of the dam and of the surroundings and secured information as to the water and weather conditions while in Austin," said he.

The investigation will probably have direct bearing upon a number of applications for the authority of the commission to construct power plant dams throughout the State, and may also lead to an in vestigation into the stability of other dams. T Austin dam was built before the commission w created. The State inquiry has been of the m thorough and rigid character, its aim being to the blame, if blame is to be laid on any, where should belong.

The Engineering News, in commenting on t Austin dam disaster, says in part:

"So far as the newspaper reports have inform the world the structure was designed and built u der the direction of a competent engineer of go reputation. The structure fails suddenly, with gre loss of life, and the public jumps to the conclusi that no engineer is reliable, and that no dam is sa We wish to combat this idea. Most emphatically we declare that it is within the resources of en neering to so build such a dam as that at Austin th it shall be safe and secure.

"It is our duty to say that the occurrence is wit out excuse, and that if the dam had been built wi proper precautions and proper regard for safety t failure would never have occurred. These disaste occur because too frequently those who build the structures buy just as little engineering and buy just as cheaply as they possibly can, and they oft reject so much of it as does not suit their fancy their purse.

"It was bad to build a dam on such a foundatio with no greater precaution to prevent water gettir under it, but it was ten times worse to attempt use the structure in its weakened and perilous co dition after the partial failure of January, 1910."

The paper concludes by urging the necessity establishing some sort of State or government supe vision and control over structures which may const tute a menace to hundreds and thousands of peop and to millions of dollars' worth of property.

An Exchange for Woman's Work

Noon Hour in the Lunch Room

The Display in the Exchange Store

By LUCY B. JEROME

ONE can't describe the atmosphere of the cheerful, sunny rooms of the Woman's Exchange by any other word than stimulating. From the table in the corner, strewn with pink, white and blue baby-caps and similar articles, to the well-laden shelves of the housekeeping department, everything speaks of effort and success. And this is just the atmosphere that the Exchange labors to create; for its work lies among a class of women that the public rarely hears of. All the plans and work of the Exchange are for the benefit of reduced gentlewomen; that class which, with tragic terror in its heart, wears a smile on its lips and the mask of a fine courtesy on its face. It is the class whose members often, through no fault of their own, suddenly find themselves with sons and daughters looking to them for an education and pleasure; or who, perhaps, thrust out into the world ignorant of its ways, unskilled in any but housewifely duties, are tossed like ships on the stream of adversity. There are those who find not only themselves dragged from the seclusion of a home, forced to face life bravely, but who find their mothers, sisters, even invalid or disabled fathers, dependent on their feeble efforts. In such situation what can the gentlewoman do? The refinements, the courtesies, the kindly tolerance of others' faults and foibles to which she has been bred, seem but to make her more unfit for the task of facing and battling with the raw conditions which confront her on the threshold of a new and strange existence. She can sew, perhaps, very well; oftener in a somewhat amateur fashion. The articles she can make, while suitable and useful for home use, are not in demand, as perfection is required before a sale can be effected. If she can cook cakes, white, light bread, the delicious corn-cake of the South, or can put up jellies and jams like an expert, the Exchange offers a ready market. If she can act as housekeeper, nurse, reader, companion, secretary or governess, there are chances for her, and the Exchange sees that she gets them. Women of the gently bred class, when forced into arduous activities by sudden stringency, are willing to learn, to adapt, to sacrifice and to improve their abilities. All they need is that there shall be a medium dealing both tactfully and intelligently with both creating and consuming class, and that this medium shall be for the benefit of both sides.

The Exchange is this medium. In its picturesquely littered rooms every conceivable article for every conceivable beautiful effect seems to find a home. Its various departments are under the control of a Board of Managers, with a working head for each. Women from Maine to Texas supply the New York Exchange with their handiwork. Money from orders and sales flows in freely. Last year, over seventy thousand dollars flowed out to different consignors. In the thirty years of its existence the Exchange has paid to gentlewomen who have furnished it with their work over a million dollars.

The Exhibit Room at the New York Woman's Exchange

The order department is the repository of a thousand dramas of the hearthstone. A young girl less than eighteen, through the sudden death of her father and the subsequent crash of his fortune, sat one evening in her beautifully appointed bedroom and asked herself the blunt question: "What can I do?" There was an invalid mother and a younger sister to support. The one thing in which she excelled was a delicate kind of stitchery, fine and exquisite as gossamer. Clinging desperately to that thought as the last hope, she boarded a car the next morning and went to the house of a friend to lay the idea before her. "Of course you can do it," asserted her friend confidently, "and the Woman's Exchange will market it for you." They went down together, a sample of the work was examined and the prospect of ready sales held out. That family is now living in comfort, disaster staved off by the slender needle of a seventeen-year-old girl!

The day that an old gentlewoman, infirm, poor and without relatives, tottered into the rooms of the Exchange, the managers looked at each other in dismay. She was so old, so feeble—what could she do? But she needed help and she needed it right then. She sat down in the first chair, bravely smiling, though a little breathless, and unwrapping a small parcel, disclosed a pair of infant's socks, knitted of hard, twisted silk, badly shaped and discouraging of aspect, but beautifully knitted, showing the hands of an expert. Here is where the Committee on Suggestions stepped in. She was given time to rest, then taken into another room, shown the kind of worsted to use, and one of the prettiest little socks in the Exchange was lent her as a sample. Two days later, she came joyfully into the office of the committee to show her work. It was a perfect copy of the sample, and since then she has been able to dispose of as many as she cares to make. She can knit without constant use of her eyes, and the income is sufficient for her scant needs.

The Committee on Suggestions attends to the educational aspect of the Exchange's work. It shows consignors how to work, what to make, and how to render their work salable. Often a package comes from some remote country district, with articles made after some newspaper directions, poor in color, entirely out of style, of the wrong materials and badly put together. If told simply that her work was unsalable, the sender, who may have snatched time from family cares and spent much thought on her creations, would probably sink into discouragement and never make a second try. But the Exchange writes a letter of instruction, mingled with kindly commendation of the good points of the work. Directions for making the same articles are carefully given, and it is rare that the workmanship does not jump fifty per cent in merit. Four hundred letters of advice and counsel have recently been written by the committee, and to each one a grateful, often pathetic, answer has quickly arrived.

Each consignor puts her own price on her work. "Do you think fifteen dollars too much for this sachet?" asked one of the Exchange's most valued contributors anxiously one afternoon. "It's all hand work, you know, and the ribbon and silk cost

B. J., Cincinnati, O. We have been debating the question whether true greatness and national progress are ever due to the people as a whole, or to individuals. What is THE MAIL-BAG'S idea?

Before the day of general education, it might have been said truthfully that no nation or people could accomplish great results without the inspiration of leadership. Great leaders have made the world's history in the past—seldom the people, who are usually subject to the will of the indomitable ones who have directed them by virtue of superior endowment. Education has enlightened the masses, quickened their perceptions and made them capable of judging and acting for themselves, but in all great movements, and in every national crisis, the influence of great leaders is apparently as powerful as ever.

R. T., Glen Sutton, Que. What was the name of King David's wife?

David had a number of wives, but those that are known chiefly to history are Abigail of Carmel (see I. Chron. 3: 1); Michal, the daughter of Saul (II. Sam. 3: 13), and Bathsheba (I. Chron. 3: 5).

M. S. L., Waldo, Kan. 1. Please explain Isa. 6: 9, 10. 2. Also Jonah 3: 4. Was there any presumption on Jonah's part, or was the statement given him directly from God?

1. The passage implies that these people, who had been wilfully deaf to rebuke, warnings and appeals, were to be left to the results of their perversity since they had determined not to understand. The Divine patience had been exhausted and they were to be given over to their wickedness; their hearts, being left untouched by the Spirit, would become impenetrable, and even the faithful delivery of the message would fail to impress them. 2. Jonah's commission, which seemed indefinite at the outset, had now assumed a definite form, and had changed from a denunciation of wickedness to an announcement of impending punishment. "Yet forty days" means clearly that unless the people repented within that time, their fate would overtake them. The sequel leads to the conclusion that if Jonah was not presumptuous in exceeding his commission by dooming Nineveh to destruction, he was at least perverse in his attitude, because Nineveh repented and was not overwhelmed.

R. G. D., Clear Lake, Okla. Please explain Acts 15: 14.

"Simeon" is a Hebrew variant of Simon, which was the family name of Peter. The occasion was a great gathering at Jerusalem, and the subject under discussion by Paul, Barnabas and James was the admission of Cornelius and his Gentile friends to the fellowship of the Church, which Hebrew members from Judea had hotly called in question. In verse 14 the apostle James tried to calm the storm and justified the course they had followed by pointing out that, as prophecy foretold, it had been from "the first" (or long ago), the divine purpose to call out from among the Gentiles a people "for His name" (that is, for God's glory), and afterward to restore the lost spiritual splendor of the Jewish race.

F. A., Tallahassee, Fla. Why is it that an alien residing in this country can send a package by mail cheaper to his home friends in China, Russia, or Japan, than an American (native born) could send it from one town to another in the same State in which he lives?

You have hit upon one of the absurdities of our postal system. It is quite true (as Hon. Jonathan Bourne, of Oregon, explained in the United States Senate lately) that American citizens do not enjoy mail privileges "equal with those enjoyed by residents of this country in transaction of business with residents of foreign countries. Within the United States postage on fourth-class matter is 16 cents a pound, with a limit of four pounds. The United States is party to a treaty under which residents of twenty-nine foreign countries may send fourth-class matter through the United States mails at 12 cents a pound, with a limit of eleven pounds. In other words, a man may send an eleven-pound package from San Francisco to Rome, Italy, at 12 cents a pound, but if he wishes to send the same articles to New York (or to the city of Oakland, California, right across the Bay from San Francisco), he must divide them into packages not to exceed four pounds each and pay sixteen cents a pound. A Japanese residing in New York can send an eleven-pound package to his friends in Tokyo at 12 cents, but an American in New York can send only a four-pound package from New York to Washington and must pay 16 cents a pound."

Mrs. L. W. J., Enid, Okla. In our class Sunday morning, the question was asked: "Why was the temple built at Jerusalem?" Was David told where as well as how to build the temple? Did the fact of Abraham having built an altar on or near Mount Moriah have anything to do with the location of the temple?

See II. Sam. 24: 16-25. This passage shows how the threshing floor of Araunah came to be chosen for the site of an altar of commemoration and sacrifice. Moreover, the Scripture and Jewish tradition unite in pointing to that threshing floor as the spot upon which Abraham prepared to offer Isaac (although some eminent authorities have disputed this). Read also the account of the purchase of the site from Ornan (Araunah) in I. Chron. 21: 26-28; and in the next chapter (I. Chron. 22: 1, 9, 10) which shows how David had a divine revelation that his son should build the temple there.

A. B. S., Topeka, Kan. What are we to understand by Mark 11: 24 and similar and direct assertions of like import?

In a previous verse, Jesus admonished his disciples to have faith in God. This is the lesson of the whole chapter. It is evident, however, that moral and not physical obstacles were referred to, but whatever they were, they would not be able to stand before a resolute faith in God. Verse 24 is simply meant to emphasize this. The disciples were soon to be sent out as evangelists and missionaries and they were to learn for themselves the power of prevailing prayer and the readiness of the Father not only to supply all the needs of those who trust in him, but to do much more when great things were to be asked and confidently expected.

Mrs. C. H., Toledo, O. 1. Please explain Sam, 28: 19 (last clause). 2. Are there such books as the sixth and seventh books of Moses?

1. "To-morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me," means in the state of the dead, the region of departed spirits, where each is assigned his own place. It does not imply identical conditions. 2. A number of apocryphal books are ascribed to Moses, which are set down as having been fabrications. Beyond the mere mention of them in tradition, there is now no trace of their existence.

Inquirer, Gettysburg, Pa. Give explanation of 1. Peter 3: 19 and 4: 6.

These passages about the "spirits in prison" have been interpreted as referring to the antediluvians, who were doomed to destruction by the Flood and who had no opportunity of hearing the Gospel.

Mrs. J. B. M., Des Moines, Ia. Is not mental suggestion largely a method of assisting nature?

It is so recognized. The Creator has stored in the laboratories of Nature energies that support, quicken and rebuild every living thing. She is greater than all the physicians and they recognize her potency as a healer in disease. Pure air, proper diet, exercise, temperance in all things, repression of the passions, a calm and reasonable conformance with nature's la as we can interpret them, are better than pi and drugs.

E. R., Baltimore, Md. Is it true to-day, as Paul's time, that an unbelieving or sinf husband is sanctified by a Christian wif

At the time when Paul wrote, there we many Christians who had just been convert from heathenism. These, in cases where th were married, were prepared to leave eith wife or husband, because the latter were n believers. Paul's rule or dictum was meant meet this peculiar emergency. He desired th the marriage relation might not be broken, b that an earnest effort might be made to w over the heathen partner. In this sense a no more, he meant that such a one might sanctified by the other. Elsewhere, howeve we are warned not to yoke ourselves with u believers, and this latter is a good rule to follo to-day. Any woman who deliberately marri a drunkard or an infidel in the hope of reforr ing him, would make a certain mistake in a plying Paul's emergency rule in such a cas since it was meant to serve where condition already existed which would have render separation peculiarly painful, especially there were children in the case.

W. M. P., Martinsville, Va. Please give an i terpretation of Mark 16: 15 to 18. Ce tain people are preaching here now a claiming that their doctrines are based c these verses.

These passages deal with the Last Commi sion, sometimes called the "Great Commission." No other evangelist gives the statements th Mark gives in verses 16, 17 and 18. Some em nent commentators contend that Mark's Gosp originally closed with verse 8 of the 16th cha ter, and that verses 9 to 20 were written b another hand, or at a later period. As the applied to the apostles themselves, there is n warrant for their modern application, a though the spiritual duty enjoined in the Com mission (v. 15) is incumbent on the church an on Christ's followers everywhere.

Finishing the United States Ship "Florida"

THE latest of the additions to the United States Navy, the Florida, is now nearing completion in the Navy Yard at Brooklyn, New York. She is a sister ship to the Delaware, and is one of the largest and most powerful naval vessels afloat. This photograph shows the "skeleton masts" which are peculiar to the new ships of the United States Navy.

J. H. R., Flint, Mich. The subject of recog nition in heaven was discussed in THE MAIL-BAG of September 27 last.

C. E. H., Allentown, Pa. We are familia with the arguments concerning the passage you cite. It is not disputed that immersio was largely practised by the early Christian Controversy on this subject could result in n definite conclusion, as many denominations hol different views.

S. R. S., Austin, Minn. 1. Presumably the did, but at Pentecost there was a special visita tion. 2. Belief in Christ, in his divinity, an in the efficacy of his atonement are essential Without such belief one cannot be a Christian 3. The passage in John 20: 17 has been a sub ject of much discussion. It is held to mean that the body in which Jesus then appeared wa not bound to the conditions of our earthly an material body. His words may have been meant as a check to Mary's loving enthusiasm over his resurrection, when her immediate task was to convey the news to his disciples.

W. H. W., Hermansville, Mo., criticises the "farmers' combine," which is projected for the purpose of eliminating the middle men and their forty per cent. profit. He writes: "If they (the farmers) can make their trust nation-wide, as they will try to do, we shall have a trust in restraint of trade that will kill the goose that lays the golden egg. No amount of logic will exculpate the producers from being involved with the middlemen and speculators in sharing the exorbitant profits."

FOR THE NATION'S HEALTH

THE great Expositions of Pure Food, just now so fashionable, are advertised, and rightly, as calculated to preserve and improve the health of the nation; but they do much more than this. As a subtle link joins together our moral, mental and physical well-being, so the great movement for pure food makes also for intelligence and for honor.

Thus, most appropriately, instructive lectures and cookery demonstrations take place daily at such great expositions; and those at that one just closing in New York have been more than usually brilliant and informing. Mrs. Lily Haxworth Wallace of London, England, a pastmistress in the gastronomic art, and many of our best known lecturers have contributed to these features of the programme. Such subjects as these indicate something of the scope of the lectures: "Higher Human Efficiency," "Vocational Training for Girls," "Cold Storage Regulations," "The Child and the Twentieth Century Mother," "Pure Food for Children's Minds," "How to Revive Prosperity in Rural Life," "Children's Gardens," "Sane and Safe Milk;" and all were treated by experts, most of them in a delightful and illuminating way. All were free to the public and well attended.

The moral effect of the presentation on every side of pure food as distinguished from adulterated, was reinforced by the New York City display of weights and measures confiscated from dishonest dealers. Between the standard bushel, for instance, and one in common use in our great markets was a difference of seven quarts. The jagged or wired scale was shown beside a just one, and carried its own warning. The very interesting exhibit of the College of the City of New York belongs also quite as much under the head of moral factors as of physical; for its students, with their siphons and retorts, were analyzing and bringing to shame the products of deceitful manufacturers. This exhibit takes the form of a miniature laboratory, where a series of experiments show the harmful ingredients of foods which because they are marked "artificially colored" are marketed without violation of the pure food laws. On the first day of the show a darning needle and a file were copper plated with the artificial coloring matter which had been taken from a can of peas. Another interesting experiment was the dyeing of a baby's woolen undershirt with the coal-tar dye from a bottle of "strawberry jam." After a little acid had been added to the mixture the little woolen shirt was soaked in it and came out a very dark red. As some of this was undoubtedly vegetable color, the garment was then treated with ammonia in such fashion as to remove all vegetable color, but leave the mineral matter unaffected. The result of this stage of the experiment was to leave the little shirt a bright cerise in color. Mr. A. M. Singer, master of decorative art, has kept his promise, and the metamorphosis of Madison Square Garden is complete. On Saturday evening the army of workmen turned their finished work over to the public. Upon entering the beautiful garden, so soon to be banished from New York and replaced with tall business blocks, it seemed to be almost ablaze with gold and white decorations, and the gay booths and banners of the exhibitors. Close beside the door was the captivating display of Heinz, with its fifty-seven varieties on a revolving shelf, and a stereopticon show of Heinz stores and employees, which forms one of the most ingenious and effective of advertisements.

The American Kitchen Products Company was offering a cup of its delicious "Steero" bouillon freely to every comer; while close by was the American Sugar Refining Company, tendering similarly dainty lumps of sugar, wrapped in tissue paper.

The Borden Company had an extensive dairy exhibit, and among its attractive bottles of milk and cream were boxes of several kinds of milk chocolate candy, which they claim to be the only dairymen to manufacture. Every guest was offered a little glass of Welch's excellent grape juice, and of the Burnham Bovine bouillon; and could find out just how Karo Syrup tastes on bread.

The Johnson Educator Food Company had, among other wholesome and toothsome products, a hard ring made of finely ground cereals, upon which the baby may cut its teeth. It is warranted to have none of the bad effects of certain other devices for this purpose, and not to choke the baby. Every one was tasting with pleasure the smoking soups at the pretty Franco-American booth, and admiring the lightly piled shredded codfish and other prepared foods on the counter of that of J. W. Beardsley's Sons; while perhaps the most gay and ornate edibles of all on display were the pink, white, yellow and green jellies (Jell-O) of the Genesee Pure Food Company. Samples of the sterling and varied output of the Beechnut Packing Company were advertised as for sale in a single box at a low price, and were attracting many purchasers.

Flour firms were making "flapjacks;" the magnificent booth of Libby, McNeill & Libby, where a full-flavored olive could be had for the asking, was piled with all kinds of delectable, glass-packed fruits, meats and condiments; as was that of the Merrell-Soule Company with None-Such mince-meat, soups and egg-powder. Royal Baking Powder, Sauer's Flavorings, and dozens of other standard preparations occupied also prominent stations in the great auditorium.

The allied domestic interests were well represented by the Consolidated Gas Company, with its stoves and heaters; the vacuum cleaners; the Crown Corking and Sealing Company; all sorts of silver, wood and shoe polishers; paper bags and boxes; flatirons; laundry starches and others.

As the exposition was largely planned and carried out by the Domestic Science Clubs, especially by Mrs. Winnifred Harper Cooley, the New York Secretary of the National Association, they naturally occupied much of the visitors' attention. In addition to Mrs. Wallace's afternoon demonstrations of cookery, there was one every morning in the Domestic Science booth.

The Federation of Day Nurseries showed a helpful little model of a day nursery, in which the infants of poor working women are cared for. The Free Industrial School for Crippled Children had an interesting display of the handiwork of its charges. The International Stewards' Association presented ideas for improving hotel conditions. The International Sunshine Society had a "living exhibit" of little ones and their work. The Little Mothers' Aid Association showed tiny East Side children learning how to cook and wash. The New York State Federation of Clubs (with those of New Jersey and Pennsylvania) had a booth where clubwomen were discussing eagerly the great issues presented in the Exposition and by the lecturers. The Woman Suffrage Party was selling fruits, embroideries and literature.

The United States Navy and Army booths showed how we feed our brave defenders; and the Sturgis & Walton Company (New York) had one for displaying their books on the famous new paper-bag cookery.

It was on the whole an inspiring show, and augured well for the future of our country.

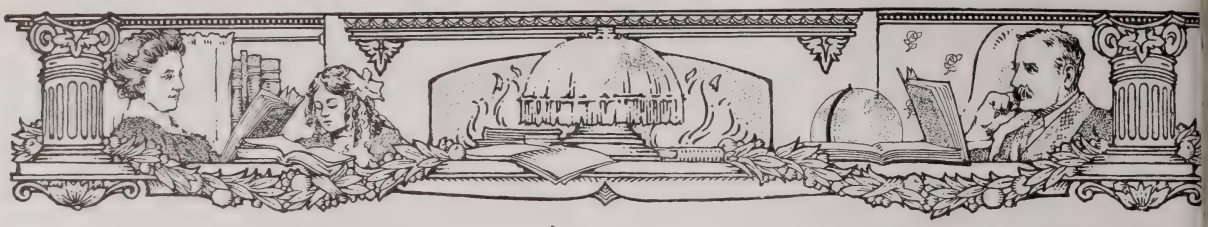
TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—A RECENT TELEGRAM from Teheran states that a great battle was fought on September 27 at Nebaran, fifty miles from Persia's capital. Salar ed Dowleh, a brother of the deposed Shah, lost 400 men killed and 200 captured, in addition to seven guns. He is reported to have retired in the direction of Hamadan, to the west, with the government troops in pursuit.

—BAYONNE, N. J., has the largest oil refinery in the world. Oil from a quarter of a million wells flows through this station. There are now 55,000 miles of steel and iron pipes, stretching throughout the country, with pumping stations at every sixty or seventy miles along the route. The total storage capacity of all the stations is 85,000,000 barrels. Seventy million barrels of crude petroleum are transported annually from the wells to the refineries.



—THE SUPREME COURT of New York State has decided that the application of a New York restaurant-keeper for a certificate of incorporation, permitting him to use the word "Hell" as the name of his restaurant, cannot be granted. It is refused on the ground that it would be against public policy to permit the use of a title or name which, "if not blasphemous, would hold the State up to ridicule and shock the sense of decent people. . . . It was unnecessary to put into the statute that blasphemous, obscene or immoral words could not be used as a corporation's name. It is a fundamental principle that they cannot be used."

—A NEW METHOD—a sort of clerical recall—by which a pastor may ascertain whether he is wanted by his congregation or if he should resign, has been suggested by a New Jersey minister. There was a division of opinion on the subject among his people, and he issued a notice announcing that on the following Sunday they could either come to service or stay away, and thus decide the question. If he preached to a good-sized congregation on that day, he would remain; but if he faced empty pews, he would betake himself to other fields. This novel suggestion may furnish a hint for other churches.

—PRESIDENT TAFT has spoken in defense of the colleges that have been attacked by the recent publication of a Chicago critic, who declared that dissipation and low morals were characteristic of university life to-day. The President, speaking during his Kansas tour, said: "Wickedness that has to be unearthed with a spade ordinarily ought to be kept under the clod that the spade raises. The truth is, universities don't differ much. I know what Yale was in my day, and I know it might have been better. I contributed something to the detectives' knowledge in those days, possibly, but to-day there is a higher standard of morality. Dissipation and drinking are frowned upon by the public opinion of the college. I resent scandalmaking and muck-raking with reference to the standard of our universities when they are doing such good work and are putting out men into our community with higher morals every year."

—AN EXAMINATION OF the after section of the battleship Maine, comprising about one-third the full length of the ship, has removed all doubt from the minds of the engineers of the feasibility of building a bulkhead in it and floating it out of the cofferdam. Consequently the fitting of the bulkhead will be begun as soon as the material for it is received from the north. There is still a possibility that the engines of the Maine are in such condition that they can be restored to service, and with temporary boilers permit of the wreck proceeding out of the harbor under her own steam. This course probably will not be adopted, however, on account of the expense involved. The next two months will be devoted to a continuation of the work of dissecting by gas blasts the shattered parts of the hull, from which more bodies may be recovered. A part of one of the forward magazines is now visible, but its condition does not warrant a conjecture regarding the character of the explosion which sank the Maine.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

Mutual Confidence

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THERE are secrets and secrets. There are open secrets and secrets under lock and key. There never need be a skeleton in the closet if there be an absence of secrecy in the home circle. The happy secrets, such as those that concern the coming of birthdays and wedding anniversaries and the Christmas holidays, are under the protection of love and serve to cement home security. Other secrets there are furtively hiding from view, secrets that cause suspicion and awaken jealousy, and they are to be avoided by all who would establish their homes in permanence and sacredness. From the hour of marriage husband and wife should share each other's thoughts as fully as they can, and in their daily conduct, in the management of business and the intimacies of friendship they should avoid everything that has to do with concealment.

A wife writing to this page is in doubt whether she should open her husband's letters, and implies her willingness to let him open and read hers before they come into her hands. There is no violation of confidence involved in a preference to read one's correspondence before it is so much as glanced over by the eyes of another. A letter is a bit of personal property, and it is a breach of ordinary politeness to break its seal. Wife and husband alike have the privilege of opening their individual correspondence, and of sharing it together if they choose. As no one who is entirely polite opens a closed door without the formality of a knock, though the door belong to a member of the family, and is the entrance to an individual room, so no really polite person opens without leave the correspondence of another. It should be taken for granted that married people are mutually interested in one another's letters, but it is not to be imagined that they shall necessarily always read every written scrap that comes into the house for one or the other. Married happiness is so precious a thing that it should be guarded with the greatest care, and if either partner in the home discerns on the horizon the smallest hint of a cloud, the duty is at once to take measures to prevent a storm.

Table Manners

BEHAVIOR at the table indicates the high-water mark of civilization. The manner of sitting at the table, of taking soup, of eating bread and butter, of passing dishes, in brief, the whole attitude of those who gather three times a day around the family board, shows whether or not they are familiar with the codes of good society. A little child should early be taught how to handle his spoon and fork. The question who shall first be served at the family table when guests are present is usually answered by the direction that the hostess or mother of the family must first be served. There may be a little confusion in this statement. If the mother is not the hostess then she is not to be first served. In this day, when it is customary to place a number of table implements at the side of a plate, when service plates are commonly used and there is more formality than of old in the arrangement of the simplest table, a hesitating guest may know just what to do by observing which spoon or fork is first used by the hostess. Women are served before men. The place of honor for a man is at the right of his hostess; for a woman at the right of the host. When a number of people are invited to a formal luncheon or dinner place cards are convenient. They may be decorative and thus be utilized as favors, or they may be simply blank cards with a name inscribed upon them.

WHEREVER else ill temper and irritability may find an excuse they are out of order at the family table. Every one who sits at breakfast, dinner or supper should bring to the meal his most amiable mood and his most genial deportment. Faultfinding at the table outrages good breeding. I greatly admired a man who was carving a tough joint for which his wife apologized. "My dear," he said, "one would fancy that you thought yourself responsible for the mistake of the market man. You of all persons are not to blame if once in a while we happen to have tough meat." The carving knife, by the way, is often the cause of exasperation to the carver. A little painstaking beforehand would usually prevent an explosion of annoyance from him, but neither tough meat nor blunt knives excuse discourtesy in the privacy of the family. The good manners that are a matter of course when one is in company should be equally practiced when one is at home. If father and mother never fail in politeness we may expect charming manners in the children.

A word may be said about the manner of the family toward the maid. If by chance she is not very skilful in her table attendance she will not grow more deft by cross looks and stifled exclamations or by reproofs given in public. If she meets with disaster, drops a knife and fork or spills something on the tablecloth the accident must be passed over in silence. A little sunshine goes far to make the lot of the average maid a cheery one, and if the daughter of the house will take the trouble to drill a novice beforehand she may be sure that her efforts will be rewarded. The best way of doing this is to let the maid seat herself at the table some time during the day while the young lady waits upon her. An object lesson of this kind will be more effectual than three times the amount of trouble otherwise taken in giving directions.

CHILDREN should not be forbidden to talk at the table, neither should they be permitted to monopolize the talk or interrupt the conversation of their elders. When they speak they should be listened to with the same politeness that is given to older people.

An Interesting Infant

JOHN ALDEN DEMMING, the budding artist in this photograph, is a descendant of that John Demming who was one of the sixteen signatories of the charter which gave the name "Charter Oak" to Hartford's famous tree, and also of the Puritan John Alden. The youngster is here adding his own idea of improvements to a canvas painted by his father, Edwin Demming, at his studio in the artists' colony in MacDougal Alley, New York.

When inquiring if a guest wou like a second helping, the martinet table manners does not inquire if t guest will have "some more." Th seems very trivial and the only jus fication for it is that the hostess d not wish to be considered critical cc cerning the guest's appetite. Peop who are on a diet, as so many are this time when doctors dictate wh one should eat and drink, should at pains not to embarass a hostess calling attention to the fact. friend of mine entertained on one c casion a number of gentlemen w were in attendance at a conventi in her town. Passing through t dining-room before dinner was serv she saw on the sideboard a loaf very nice looking bread. Supposi that her husband had brought it as treat, she had it sliced and a porti placed on each bread and butter pla to be eaten with the soup. What w her dismay when a clergyman, imm diately after grace had been sa asked in a hesitating voice what h become of his individual loaf that had ventured to bring. A tactle man who had never found out th butter is not always served at dinn being one of the guests when it h been purposely omitted, embarass his hostess by genially exclaiming, think, madam, that you have forg ten the butter." There are tim when tact is golden.

What Do We Mean by Patience?

THERE are words which the di tionary does not define half intelligibly as we define them for ou selves. What is it to be patient? is in your experience and in mine practical exercise for which life giv us daily opportunity. We are not p tient when we are unamiable, althou we may bear up against hardshi with grim fortitude. To be patie and fretful at one and the same tin is impossible. Whoever would be p tient must be cheerful, and to be chee ful in the face of discouragement, be patient when things go wrong ar to maintain optimism when physical depressed are about as difficult as walk into a den of lions or, in t words of the hymn, "to face a frownin world."

The Old Man of the Mountai

IN POINT of scenic beauty t White Mountains of New Hamp shire have no rival in Eastern Ame ica. Perhaps the most picturesq group of the entire Appalachain sy tem is the section of highland in t northern corner of the Granite Stat where from a wind-ridden altitude four thousand feet four hundre square miles of spruce-covered mou tains reach their snowy peaks into t sky-country. The king of the hig land is unquestionably Mount Wash ington, but the king of the regio itself, of its rich valleys and intervale of its lakes, broad highways, meande ing streams and Indian trails, of i sunsets and dawns, of its weird moo light effects upon strange geolologic freaks, that metamorphose the va region into a fairy land and monste land in one, is the Old Man of th Mountain, an excellent picture which is the cover of this week's issu of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

People in the Public Eye

Rear-Admiral Schley Dead

REAR-ADMIRAL WINFIELD SCOTT SCHLEY, the hero of the battle of Santiago and one of the veterans of the American navy, died suddenly on October 2 in New York City. He had just come out of the New York Yacht Club, of which he was a member, and started up West Forty-fourth Street when he was seen to stagger and fall heavily to the sidewalk, his head striking on the curb. Although a crowd gathered at the admiral's side, no one knew who he was until his body was identified at the Fifty-first Street police station, through an inscription on a gold watch presented to him by the State of Maryland for saving the lives of six comrades in 1884. The police at once notified the Army and Navy Club and the relatives and friends of the Admiral. The cause of his death was a cerebral hemorrhage. Next day, the body was taken to Washington for the funeral at the Schley home in I Street. The interment was in Arlington Cemetery.

The Late Rear-Admiral W. S. Schley

Rear-Admiral Schley was born on October 9, 1839, near Frederick, Md. He was descended from a line of famous seafarers and fighters. His father, John Thomas Schley, had distinguished himself in the navy. Young Schley was appointed midshipman in 1856 and four years later graduated at the head of his class. From that time on his progress was rapid. He saw service in Chinese waters, on the Potomac during the Civil War, in the Gulf of Mexico and on the Mississippi. As lieutenant, he took an active part in all the engagements leading up to the capture of Port Hudson. While an executive officer to the gunboat Wateree of the Pacific fleet, he put down an insurrection among the Chinese coolies on the Chincha Islands. Then, at La Union, Salvador, he landed a force of one hundred men under his command to protect the consulate and custom house during a revolution. In 1866, he became lieutenant-commander, a 1874 commander, from 1880 to 1883 inspector of the Second Lighthouse District, then a member of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting. In 1884 he was put in charge of the Greely Arctic relief expedition and rescued six survivors from the ice at Cape Sabine, for which Congress awarded him a gold medal and President Arthur promoted him to be chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting. When the Spanish-American war broke out he was made commodore and placed in charge of the "Flying Squadron" and took part in the battle of Santiago Bay, when Cervera's fleet was either sunk or captured. In October, 1901, he was retired with the rank of Rear-Admiral.

LaFollette's Early Struggles

IN an autobiographical sketch of his career, published in the current issue of the American Magazine, Hon. Robert M. LaFollette takes the public into his confidence and gives some very interesting personal history. He says:

"I was as poverty-stricken a young lawyer as ever hung his shingle to the wind in the State of Wisconsin. I had no money at all. My single term at the University law school had been rendered possible only through the consideration of the faculty in making an extraordinary exception in my case, and permitting me to enter without paying the usual matriculation fee. I had no money—but as fine an assortment of obligations and ambitions as any young man ever had. I had my mother and sister to support, as I had supported them partially all through my college course—and finally, I had become engaged to be married!

"To an impecunious young lawyer almost without clients, the district attorneyship of Dane County, paying at that time the munificent salary of $800 a year with an allowance of $50 for expenses, seemed like a golden opportunity. Though it appeared immeasurably difficult of attainment, I determined to make for it with all my strength. What I wanted was an opportunity to work—to practise my profession—and to make a living. I knew that trial work would appeal to me, and I believed I could try criminal cases successfully.

"I had an old horse which I had used during my university course in riding out to a district school I had taught to aid in paying my way, and borrowing a buggy and harness from Ben Miner, a friend and supporter, I now began driving through the country and talking with the farmers about my candidacy. It was harvest time and I remember how I often tied my horse, climbed the fences, and found the farmer and his men in the fields.

"'Ain't you over-young?' was the objection chiefly raised.

"I was small of stature and thin—at that time I weighed only one hundred and twenty pounds—and I looked even younger than I really was. Nor was I than in good health.

"Throughout my university course I had been compelled to do much outside work. Besides teaching school I had become proprietor of the University Press, then the only college paper, burdening myself with debt in the purchase. It was published bi-monthly, and I not only did the editorial work but made up the forms and hustled for advertisements and subscriptions. Under the strain of all these tasks, added to my regular college work, my health, naturally robust, gave way, and for four or five years I went down under the load at the end of every term of court. A marked physical change came to me later and I have grown stronger and stronger with the years."

OUR BOYS AND GIRLS

IN MY TOMBOY DAYS—By the Aunt in the Cozy Corner

MY DEAR Cozy Corner Boys: It is nice to be getting back to school along with your chums and companions again, but I fancy to some of you it seems a bit too soon to be shut up in a schoolhouse just when all the big harvest is gathering and the days are bright and cool and full of autumn gold. Serious things like lessons to be learned seem pretty dull just now, but after all, the days are long enough for plenty of fun too, and if you fall behind in your studies at the start you will be bothered all the year trying to catch up. In good old college slang, "buckle down" and learn them, and find out for yourselves how much more fun there is in the game and how much more interesting the story book is when lessons are mastered and out of the way.

But it is the shelf of books in my library that goes by the name "My Tomboy Days" that I promised several weeks ago to tell you about.

I shall just name the books on the shelf yonder where they have stood for a good many years. I fancy I did not read them all word for word, but like one Joe Scranbie in a magazine story that I once read, "I nibbled at the fire in 'em all, over and over again, and got a likely lot o' good out'n other folks' story writin'."

"The Monkey Book"—Read to Death in the Nursery

First in Line

LEATHERSTOCKING TALES, there they are, five of them standing in a row. The Pathfinder, Pioneer, Deerslayer, Prairie, Last of the Mohicans — Westward Ho, Aesop's Fables, Jack-a-Napes, The Boys' King Arthur, and Miss Maitland's splendid story book, Heroes of Chivalry, in which the story of Roland and Oliver is so wonderfully set down; and Robinson Crusoe. The dear old battered volume looks very much like the picture of the Monkey book on this page. I read it to death. Then come The Tower of London, The Lives of the Pioneers, Daniel Boone, Davy Crockett and Kit Carson and Boyhood of Lincoln. To this day I take that volume down and read it with the same old delight. The stories of Magellan, Walter Raleigh and Francis Drake, stand there like captains of the shelf. I used to dream like any other dear foolish boy of going to sea before the mast, The Tower of London, The Star Chamber and half a dozen of Sir Walter Scott's novels. I nibbled out the Border War chapters, the descriptions of the great Scottish clans, and all the witchcraft and wizardry, the way a squirrel nibbles the heart out of a horse-chestnut. Then comes a big well-worn volume of Bible stories bound in maroon cloth with gilt letters on the cover; the pictures in it are colored and very crude, and for some reason or other it formed a large part of my tomboy days. The stories of David and Jonathan, of Elijah and the bears, of Absalom, Saul, Jonah and Daniel; the Queen of Sheba's visit to Solomon, the Red Sea adventure and the wonderful moment when Joshua commanded the sun to stand still at Ajalon; the miracles and the parables—no Wonder Tales seemed ever quite so thrilling as these. I suppose this is because they were true. The Conquest of Mexico horrified and fascinated me even when I was a very little tomboy. The Travels of Marco Polo, Hezekiah Butterworth's Zig Zag Journeys Everywhere and Jules Verne's Voyage to the Moon, Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea and Round the World in Eighty Days. They were always more wonderful to me than were Gulliver's astonishing journeys, and when I think of the airships, submarines and motor boats, of the world-records of girdling the earth in considerably less than eighty days, and the miles of pneumatic tube through which the mails are sent hither and yon, these wildest romances of my tomboy days look something like books of prophecy.

But my list is very long, and I have only come half way across the shelf. I am sure that if I were a tomboy now I should replace some of the old favorites with more recent stories. Stuart Ed. White's books, the Jungle Books of course, Poor Boys Who Became Famous, The Prince and the Pauper, the Henty books—Two Years Before the Mast, Treasure Island and Kidnapped, With the Night Mail, by Rudyard Kipling, Scouting for Light Horse Harry of the Stuart Schuyler Series, The Scientific American Boy, by A. Russel Bond, Track's End, by Hayden Carruth, The Scouts of the Valley, by Altschuler, and ever so many more.

Start a Collection

Do not be content, boys, with reading exclusively the books that any one person has read and loved. Go exploring in the vast book world for yourselves. You will be surprised at the treasure. If you have any taste for books at all, you will find it like mining for gold in the mother vein. But by all means start a small collection of books. Books are inexpensive nowadays, almost any boy can have a shelf of greatest stories and thriller tales ever written.

LITTLE PEOPLE'S CORNER AND ANOTHER PRIZE OFFER

Ottoman-Italy—A Good Game

A ROADWAY or a path should divide the playground into two territories. At the farthest side of each territory an open line of flags must be placed at intervals on the ground. Handkerchiefs will do and the number must be determined by the number of players. Ten flags are enough for fifteen or twenty players. The players divide themselves into the two nations, and the game consists in each side trying to get the flags from the other side, to guard its own flags, and to catch the enemy when he is off his own ground.

Once a player sets foot upon the enemy's territory, he must not turn back, but must go on, though he can not be caught if he has captured a flag. If he has no flag and is caught, he must stand still, for he becomes a prisoner, and is only released by being touched by one of his own party. A player may not redeem a prisoner and take a flag at the same time. The game ends when all the flags of one side have been taken. Ottoman-Italy is a variation of Chevy Chase or Prisoner's Base, the very best of the good old running games, and has the added interest and excitement of being distinctly up-to-date.

What Sam Big Horse Knew

By GRACE BOTELER SANDERS

OLLY MAY frowned anxiously as she took the note from the Apache half-breed. Her pretty s were pursed into a worried pout. ere were disfiguring lines across r usually smooth forehead. "You uncle gave you this?" she ques- ned, looking at Sam with wonder- brown eyes. "I'm very much iged to you for bringing it. You dn't wait. There is no answer."

'Sam Big Horse hungry," grunted Indian, placing his hand on his mach and looking up to the girl pealingly. With inward disgust lly turned and went into the little chen.

'I haven't much cooked," she said dly as she put the cloth on the ble, "but you're welcome to what I ve. Sit right down."

'Lit' white missie 'fraid," ventured m, eyeing her sharply. Dolly shook r head and smiled, showing two ws of even white teeth.

'How could I be when I have Aunt becca?" she laughed, nodding tow- d the big rifle which stood behind door. "That is a repeater and can gh up bullets faster than I can ak. Whenever I hear the slightest ise, I train the gun right in the di- tion from which the sound comes. n not afraid to shoot, either."

Sam helped himself to a generous ply of baked beans. "If lit' missie nt help, she know who to call on," said significantly. "Sam be in cky Gulch till day after to-morrow."

Evidently the Indian knew the con- nts of the note which he had ught. Thinking of this Dolly nced once more at the familiar awl.

"Dear Niece: Had a bad fall and n pretty badly crippled up. Prob- ly will be for several days, but am good hands here at the Stebbins mp. Don't worry. Will be home your birthday. Keep Sam if you ed him."

Dolly looked doubtfully at the lid copper face. There was some- ng about the Indian which she had ver liked. Although he had been trusted by the white people with ny important missions, the girl had spected him ever since the first day their meeting.

As she watched the raven head bent er the coffee cup Dolly recalled the y at the station.

Dolly May had lived in New York her life. She had been a book- eper in a large department store er since she left school. When she s eighteen her father's health led, so that the burden of family pport fell on her. Thus she became accustomed to doing everything for rself that she noticed little change en her parents died. She did not nk of leaving the city. She sold off household goods, rented a room, d went on with her work. But an ack of typhoid fever left her weak d almost penniless. Then it was at Uncle Ben, her father's brother, o was running a stage coach in the cky Mountains, appeared on the ene.

One morning when poor Dolly was discouraged that she was ready to ve it up, but could not, he blew into r stuffy boarding house. His pres- ce was as refreshing as an invigo- ting breeze from the ocean. The nute she saw his tall, well-knit rm, rosy cheeks and bright eyes she t better, and when he gathered her in his strong arms and carried her om the parlor to her own room, lly felt waves of strength all over r small body.

For a moment he sat and looked at r thoughtfully. "I'm going to take u right out of here, young lady," he nounced after a moment. "You are e a lily that was raised in a dark llar. You need sunshine and fresh r. You need to go where folks live. Why, I couldn't breathe in such a hole as this." He pounded vigorously on his broad chest. "You need to go to the hills, and I'm just the fellow to take you. It is June there, but not as you think of June in New York. The trees have spread out a bed of fragrant pine needles for you to rest on. The air is ozone, pure and undefiled. The sky is blue, and the great old mountains are covered with flowers and crowned with snow-wreaths. Rocky Gulch is forty miles from a railroad. The stage comes only twice a week, but that's the place where you're going. I'm going to carry you off bodily and keep you there, in chains, if necessary, until you are well. Afterward, if you say you prefer this hot house, you may come back. But I'm not one bit afraid."

Dolly was so grateful for the offer that she had not dreamed of objecting even to a town forty miles from a railroad. In her well days she would have thought of such a place with horror. She was glad for her uncle to make the arrangements. Inside of sixteen hours they were in the Pullman, and the third morning came as the train pulled into Denver.

She was too weak for sight-seeing, but when they took the little narrow gauge which stopped at Tucsonville, her interest began to rise. Through the open windows, she could see the snow-crowned mountains of which she had dreamed. She could breathe in the delicious air. It was so refreshing, so satisfying!

Uncle Ben pointed out the different crops and compared them with the products of the East. When they stopped at Tucsonville, surrounded by cactus and sage brush and prickly pear, almost the first face she saw was that of Sam Big Horse.

For some reason, explainable only to himself, Sam had seen fit to array himself in full war-paint. He wore a buckskin beaded suit and an immense head-dress of beautiful feathers. His ears and nose were decorated with small sea-shells and silver rings, and the paint upon his face would have decorated a whole family in most approved Indian fashion. His face was sombre, the expression almost forbidding.

One glimpse of this formidable object was enough. Dolly sank back in her seat and covered her eyes with her hands. "O uncle!" she gasped, "are such monstrosities common here?"

Mr. Dean looked quickly to see what awful thing the shaking little forefinger was now pointing out. As he did so he laughed heartily:

"That's Sam Big Horse, as harmless an Indian as ever wore war-paint," he returned gaily. "Once and a while he takes a notion to deck himself out thus. I presume that he wants to remind people of the former glory of his race, that they may compare it with the worthlessness of the Indian of the present day. Three hundred and fifty days of the year he wears a white man's clothes and affects white man's ways. The other fifteen and a quarter, he is an Injun, right. I suppose that he brought the carriage over for us. When he delivers it he will stalk away on foot and stay until he is ready to come back."

But when Mr. Dean carried his niece from the train to the wagon, Sam Big Horse stalked after them with a display of interest.

"This is my niece, Sam," said Mr. Dean, expecting to hear the usual grunt of contempt. Imagine his surprise when Dolly, struggling to control herself, held out one white hand and said, "Sam, I am glad to see you." The Indian carefully took the pink palm in his hand and looked at it wonderingly. "Heap much break easy!" he grunted and walked to the front seat, climbed to the top of the wagon,

HOUSE PLANS FREE

Send 6 cents for a copy of "24 CRAFTSMAN HOUSES," showing exterior and floor plans of 24 houses that cost from $900 up to build. To interest you in our magazine, "THE CRAFTSMAN," our FREE HOUSE PLANS, and in Craft articles, we will also send you a beautifully printed 32-page booklet entitled "The Craftsman House." If you are interested at all, both of these books will be very useful to you.

"THE CRAFTSMAN IDEA" means real homes, not mere houses: it shows you how to save money on useless partitions—how to avoid over-decoration, how to get wide sweeps of space (even in a small house), restful tones that match and blend—and enables anyone to always have a beautiful and artistic home

"THE CRAFTSMAN MAGAZINE" treats of building, furnishing and beautifying homes—of art—embroidery—cabinet work—and kindred topics. In the Magazine each month are published the plans of two new and entirely different houses. Already we have shown 125 houses, and you can have your own choice.

"CRAFTSMAN HOMES," by Gustav Stickley, 205 pages, beautifully bound and printed, treats of home building, home making, home furnishings in full.

took the reins and carefully drove away.

Dolly had felt so much better the next morning that she began to unpack her trunk. At the bottom she found a bead necklace and several medals which she had won at a school tournament. When Sam came to the barn to harness the horses, she smilingly presented the trinkets to him. Apparently he cared little for the adornments. He pinned the badges on his breast and strung the necklace about his neck. Dolly Dean did not know it, but that day she had gained in Sam Big Horse a lasting friend.

The girl did not dream of being lonely. Through the long summer days she lay for hours on a bed of pine needles looking up into the soft blue sky. As she grew stronger she went hill-climbing and grew braver and rosier all the while. She learned to ride and drive and shoot. One day Sam brought her a regular Indian costume. The short skirt and hunting shirt and leggins were made of buckskin and beautifully beaded. To his delight she tried them on and wore them afterward, nearly all the time. He was her trusty companion on all her tramps, but in spite of all that, Dolly Dean could not lose the impression which she had received that first day.

"I wish I could go to uncle," she said thoughtfully. "He might need me."

Sam shook his head. "Big Bill's camp no place for little missie," he said. "They take care of white brave all right."

It was almost dark when Sam finished eating and strode away. Dolly went to bed early that night. She awakened early the next morning, but when she went to the kitchen to prepare breakfast, she found that Sam had been there before her. A bright fire was burning, every bucket was filled, but Sam was nowhere to be seen. The snow was falling fast. For a moment, as the girl remembered the approaching birthday, she stood looking sadly out on the dreary scene. For the first time she longed for the metropolis, that land of laughter and song.

For several weeks there had been rumors of trouble among the Indians of the Northwest Reservation. A party of redskins had held up and robbed a stage on the next relay. Soldiers from the fort had been sent out to capture the marauders, but the party had fled, leaving only smoking campfires to tell where they had been. What if Uncle Ben had been detained purposely? It was only with greatest effort that she threw aside the disturbing thoughts.

"How foolish I am!" she laughed, going back to the stove. "Uncle will come home safely just as he always does. I'm going to get up a number one dinner for to-morrow, and if he don't come I'll invite in the halt and the lame to feast with me. If he isn't here by the time the dinner is over I'll rout out Sam, and he and I will take the stage. I wouldn't be afraid to go alone if I were a little stronger, but these horses do pull so."

Dolly shook her head ruefully as she looked down at her small wrists. "It needs a man to manage those horses," she laughed.

In the pleasure of making cakes and pies and cookies, the girl forgot the passing hours. It was twelve o'clock when Sam Big Horse slouched up to the house and, without knocking, opened the door.

Dolly looked up brightly. "You're just in time for dinner," she said pleasantly. "Maybe I can pay for the help you gave me by a good dinner." The Indian tried in vain to keep the girl from knowing that he was pleased at the delicate compliment. "Me no do nothin'!" he declared, and sat down before a dish filled with smoking rabbit, "but I'll drive the stage to-morrow."

"You won't need to do that!" declared Dolly confidently. "Uncle Ben will be back."

Sam shook his head. "Me no know," he said stubbornly.

When he was gone Dolly laid her paring knife aside. All afternoon she studied over her plans. She was up early next morning and dressed when Sam came to sweep the paths. As soon as she saw him, she ran to open the door. "Come here; I want to talk to you!" she called.

Sam approached the house slowly. "I want you to harness the horses and get ready to start to Alton right away," commanded Dolly. "I'm uneasy about uncle, so I'm going with you as far as the Stebbins Place."

The Indian fidgeted and dropped his eyes. "Too cold for lit' missie," he objected; "better stay by fire. White chief all right."

"You needn't begin to argue with me," spoke up the girl sharply. "I thought over it last night. No matter what you say, I am going."

"Mighty dangerous these days. Robbers kill us mebbe—they all got shoot guns."

"So have I!" interrupted the girl fiercely; "and I'll use it too, if it's necessary."

Sam said no more. With a sullen face he strode out of the yard, and thirty minutes later drove up to the door with cracking of whip and plunging of horses. Dolly, well wrapped, and carrying the old rifle, came out as soon as the stage stopped. Sam opened the door for her, expecting that she would join the passengers, but she shook her head.

"I'm going to ride with you to protect you from the robbers!" she laughed as she commanded him to close the door. Without more ado Sam helped her to the high seat, spoke to the horses, and they were off.

In three-quarters of an hour they passed the snow line and were pulling over hills and creeping through the valleys. Just as they reached Dead Man's Gulch, the cracking of rifles greeted them. To the left Dolly saw a party of Indians in war-paint. They were led by a white man in a mask, who rushed out to catch the horses by the bit. "Sam, you traitor, why you got that girl on there?" he shouted.

For answer Sam lashed the frightened horses until they broke away, knocked the masked man over and went clattering down the hill. Shots rang through the gulch, but the horses galloped on. As they turned the corner a bullet sang by Dolly's ear, passed on and swept Sam Big Horse off the stage. He fell with a thud into the snow, but Dolly could not have stopped if she had wished.

The horses were so frightened that they were going at a breakneck speed. In a few moments at this rate the Indians would be far behind. With a prayer on her lips the girl caught the reins and held them, but the horses galloped on. As they flew by the half-way house Dolly caught tantalizing glimpses of bright fires and a well-filled table. Reason urged her to stay. Duty commanded her to go on.

Where was Uncle Ben? He had saved her once. Now she must rescue him. Where was Sam? Had he turned traitor and been the cause of all this trouble? The distrust which Dolly had felt for him now grew apace as she remembered how he had urged her to stay at home. He must have known of this proposed attack.

They were approaching Alton now. The first face which Dolly saw when she drove up to Traveller's Rest was that of Sam Big Horse. He was surrounded by a group of soldiers to whom he was talking excitedly. As soon as Dolly climbed from the seat, she was carried into the big warm room. While the landlady untied her shoes, another brought a tub of cold

Moulding Troubles Into Comforts

YEARS AGO financial disaster and about eight years of invalidism pushed this man into long and exhaustive study of food and beverage better for human health. His own need taught the need of others.

He said: "Thanks for the experience."

Every obstacle in human life is for a purpose.

Overcoming obstacles strengthens character, and, rightly viewed, they can be turned into blessings.

Nature's way to strength of body and mind is through trials and toughening experience.

Take your "bumps" with a smile (even if a bit grim at times) and extract the essence. This man's experience gave to the world better food and drink for the healthful welfare of millions.

The world repaid him a hundredfold. So the world will repay each one who rides down obstacles and considers them as strength-giving experiences for future attainment.

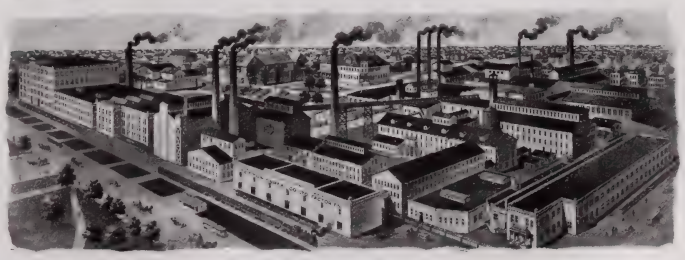
The foods were worked out from years of skilful training, each for a purpose, and hence the world-famous phrase,

"There's a Reason."

This morning beverage was perfected for those who are unfavorably affected by coffee. Postum, when well brewed, has the deep seal brown of coffee and a flavour very like the milder brands of pure Java, but it contains absolutely no ingredients except the nourishing parts of wheat and New Orleans molasses (in small proportion). Its use is health-giving to a marked degree.

Grape-Nuts was made to supply a nourishing food partly digested in the process of making. It contains the most vital properties Nature demands from which to rebuild the nerve centres, brain and solar plexus, and is wonderfully easy of digestion.

Post Toasties are made of thinly rolled bits of white corn toasted to a delicate brown, and present one of the most pleasing foods that the palate is called upon to criticise. The nourishing properties of Indian Corn are sufficiently well known to require no further comment.



"Little White Barn" where the Manufacture of Postum was started Jan. 1, 1895.

Postum was first made in the little white barn still preserved in the midst of the great group of factories now composing the famous pure-food works at Battle Creek.

The growth from the humble beginning to the present mammoth plant is another illustration of "There's a Reason."

A profusely illustrated book showing the processes will be sent to mail inquirers who ask for "The Door Unbolted."

A Chinese Concordance

NEXT to the Chinese Bible itself, the most important agent for the evangelization of China will doubtless be a complete Concordance to the Bible, which will enable native converts and missionaries to use the Word to the greatest advantage. Although China has had the Bible in her own language for a hundred years, there is not yet in print a complete concordance to the Chinese Bible, although there is now an abridged concordance to the New Testament. For years Rev. H. G. C. Hallock, Ph.D., brother of the well-known American minister, Rev. G. B. V. Hallock, has labored in China with seven native scholars, preparing a complete concordance to the Chinese Bible. They have now completed their great work. The Bible is the best selling book in China. One hundred and fifty-four million Bibles have been sold in that country during the last century. Already there are 150 branches of the International Bible Reading Association, with about 6,000 members.

Dr. Hallock and His Co-workers With the Chinese Bible Concordance

Dr. Hallock has been a missionary in China for fifteen years, and his heart and soul are in the work there. He publishes tracts in the Chinese language, and also superintends the work in four churches, eight ragged schools, and three day schools in Shanghai. He is assisted by twelve native helpers. About 1,100 children attend his ragged schools.

water for her aching feet. Now that the strain was over it would have been so easy to have gone to sleep and forgot everything in the delightful warmth. Dreamily she listened to the landlord's boasting voice:

"There's not one Western girl in a hundred that would have done what this tenderfoot managed. I say she's a fust-class hero, and she ort to have a medal."

"That's right!" said a man's voice. "But how'd the Injun git into it, I'd like to know!"

The landlord laughed curiously. "That's the funny part of it," he said slowly. "You don't often hear of an Injun turnin' white or goin' against his own people, but t'seems Sam Big Hoss is an exception. He's been workin' for Ben Dean fer quite a while. Declared he'd leave when he heard that the gal was comin', rigged himself up in war paint pupposely to skeer her an' went to the deepo that a way. When he saw how brave she was and how sick, it seems he kind a caved in. The next day she give him some beads and fol-de-rols sich as Injuns like. 'Stead of bein' afraid of him, soon as she was able to get out, she trotted with him everywhere. She cooked him good things to eat whenever he come there and told him about the city and read him Bible stories whenever he'd listen. One about castin' bread on the water—meanin' return good for good—stuck in his craw, and it seemed that he couldn't git rid of it, for he owned up to bein' in the plot to rob the mail. So's when they rode along he got to thinkin' of how good she'd been to him and all that, an' when the robbers run out 'spectin' for the whole stage to fall into their clutches, Sam whipped up the hosses and tried to git away. A dozen of 'em let their guns cough to once. One shot hit Sam. Luckily he fell off right on the edge of Steele's Cavern. Soon as he saw where he was, he didn't stop a minute; for he knowed that to go through the cave, if he could git through, would cut off a lot of the trip to town."

"I reckon it'll hardly be safe for the Injun to go out very soon," drawled a voice.

"Huh! won't it! There's a whole reg'ment of guv'ment officers scourin' the country right now. They'll git every feller, but Sam'll git a pension."

"And where is uncle?" Dolly sat up and pricked her ears to listen.

"Why he's here, bless your life!" laughed the landlord. "He's got away and come here for help just a few minutes after the Injun come in."

"Well, well! This is a pretty kettle of fish!" cried a voice at the girl's elbow. "This is a queer way for a New York lady to celebrate her birthday!"

A few days after, when Dolly was hurrying about her little kitchen, she saw a familiar figure slouching up the walk. With outstretched hands she met the visitor. "O Sam! I can never thank you enough for what you did!" she cried childishly.

Sam grinned sheepishly from beneath his wonderful head-dress of many colors. "'Twarn't nothin'!" he grunted; "nothin' 'tall to what you did for pore Injun. Wasn't that the bread comin' back off the waters, white missie?"

Not until then did Dolly realize that Sam Big Horse knew.

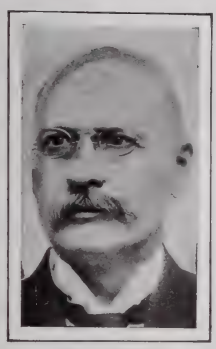
The Panhandle of Idaho

Has greatly diversified land, climate, altitude and products. It is a country to suit all comers. On one farm has been grown a total of 112 different varieties of products.

There is a vast area of cut-over timber land in the northern "Panhandle" admirably adapted to farming. This can be obtained at prices as low as $10 per acre. The soil of Northern Idaho is very deep and made up of richest ingredients. All the cereals, corn, potatoes and other vegetables, fruits and grasses grow in abundance.

The Nez Perce and Camas Prairie Country is famous for its grain production, for its blooded cattle, and is particularly well adapted to dairying, hog-raising and general farming.

The Lewiston-Clarkston region, with its five and ten acre irrigated orchards and vineyards, is very attractive to homeseekers. The State University at Moscow, a State Normal School at Lewiston, and the State College at Pullman, Wash., offer exceptional advantages.



Write for free copies of booklets "Eastern Washington and Northern Idaho" and "The Lewiston-Clarkston-Clearwater Country" with other literature and full information about low Homeseekers' fares, effective the first and third Tuesdays of each month.

To Gladden Farm-Home Life

TO bring joy into the isolated lives of women on the farms is the special object of the first International Congress of Farm Women on the calendar at Colorado Springs, Colorado, October 17 to 20. One of the principal subjects on the programme is the possibilities of the rural church, presented by Rev. Warren H. Wilson of New York; and the adoption of proposed of a plan of work for quickening religious life in the farm homes in the rural districts. In addition, there are discussions by experts on the country school; the farmhouse, its equipment and sanitation; the co-operation of organized farmers' ladies with the farmer's wife; the conservation of time and strength and the value of rest; good values; demonstrations in cooking, in emergency nursing and simple home hygiene; the care of infants, young and defective children; and labor saving devices for the home. The Women's Congress for the Betterment of the Farm Home is an outgrowth of the International Dry Farming Congress (of which Hon. John Worst, former Lieutenant-Governor of North Dakota, and now head of the State Agricultural College, is president), which holds its sixth annual congress at the same time and place. The first branch conference of the Women's Group is that of South Africa, where the work was adopted under the patronage of Viscountess Gladstone (daughter-in-law of the famous William Ewart Gladstone, and wife of the Governor-General of the Union of South Africa), with Lady Methuen, president, Mrs. Louis Botha and Mrs. Johann Rissik, and other ladies as promoters, and with headquarters at Pretoria. The leaders in the movement in this country include president Mrs. William F. Slocum and Executive Secretary Mrs. John T. Burns, whose husband is the prime mover in the International Dry Farming Congress.

Hon. J. H. Worst
President North Dakota Agricultural College and of the International Dry Farming Congress

It is the purpose of the women leaders to organize plans of work which will be effectively taken up and carried on in all parts of the world where women are isolated on the farm, and thus lead to the desired result of making the farm home and the country a happier place to live in. Besides the International Congress of Farm Women, the Dry Farming Congress, which has done much for the increase of crop values under scientific farm methods, now includes in its scope the International Conference of Agricultural Colleges and Experiment Stations; the Great Plains Co-operative Experimental Association; and an exposition of dry-farmed products and farm machinery from this country, Canada, and a half dozen foreign countries. The sixth congress has as delegates seven governors of States; ten presidents of agricultural colleges; fifty professors of similar institutions; fifty members of the United States Department of Agriculture staff; fifty foreign agricultural authorities; and over 2,500 prominent farmers and business men. A White Funeral

THE writer traveled lately twenty-eight hundred miles to Mexico, to attend the funeral service of a friend, Mr. W. W. Williams, a business man of that city, and was much surprised and pleased with a most unusual feature of it. Mr. Williams had lived a most exemplary and godly life—what may well be called a white life. His remains were dressed in white, even to the shoes. The casket was white, and was drawn by white horses in a white hearse. The drapery on the bell-knob was white. The widow and bereft daughter and every woman among the many relatives and intimate friends were dressed in spotless white. Arriving at the grave I found it lined with white.

At the funeral of such a person why should it not be so? When "the angel of the Lord" stood by the sepulchre in Joseph's garden, we are told, "his raiment was white as snow." The women looking into the sepulchre saw there "a young man clothed in a long white garment." Of those who "have not defiled their garments" it was written, "They shall walk with me in white, for they are worthy. He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment." And when the angel who was John's interpreter of his visions of glory called attention to the most distinguished group in heaven—these which are arrayed in white robes"—he informed John that "these are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Chalmers "30" Touring Car, 5-Passenger,—$1500 Including magneto, Prest-O-Lite tank, gas lamps, oil lamps, top, windshield, ventilated fore-doors, horn, tools

"Guaranteed Sound"

WHEN you go to a horse market, ask the price of a horse, and a reputable dealer replies, "$200 and guaranteed sound," you know that with this statement he guarantees the horse to have good eyes, good ears, good hoofs, sound bones, and to be free of disease.

"Guaranteed sound" really goes back of the horse as he stands before you, to the sires and dams that have preceded him and to the training and care that he has had.

Every Chalmers car is guaranteed sound—guaranteed in every part and particle. We not only guarantee it to be sound the day it is delivered; we guarantee a sound record behind every Chalmers car preceeding it; we guarantee it to keep sound; we guarantee service.

The Chalmers car is a champion; a car with a pedigree. A car of performance—15,000 satisfied owners prove this.

It's when you get down under the hood to the heart of things that the Chalmers guarantee means most. The Chalmers motor has been the wonder of the automobile world ever since this car appeared on the market; such remarkable power in proportion to weight, such smoothness and quietness, such reliability and economy had never been known before.

The Chalmers "30" this year is offered fully equipped, for $1500. Last year this car sold for $1750 equipped with magneto, gas lamps, top and windshield.

This year, refined, and improved in every possible way, with thoroughly ventilated fore-door bodies, inside control, magneto, gas lamps, Prest-O-Lite tank, and including also Chalmers mohair top and windshield—$1500! It is the big motor car bargain for the 1912 season.

Every farmer knows that it is best in the end to buy good machinery. It is worth while to pay a little extra price in order to be certain that you get a good machine in the first place—one guaranteed by a company able to make good every promise.

We make also the Chalmers "Thirty-six"—$1800—a car of greater size and power, including Bosch dual ignition, self-starter, Continental demountable rims and many other high-grade features.

A postal card will bring you our new catalog and the name of dealer nearest you. We shall be very glad to hear from you.

HELP THE GREAT CAUSE

BY SINGING THE BEAUTIFUL NEW SONG

"Let Us Have Peace"

The poem by George Graff, Jr., is the most inspiring ever written on this subject, while the musical setting by Earnest R. Ball, the celebrated composer, is positively sublime.

Nothing will do more to instil in the minds of the multitudes this great cause for which the Peace organizations of the world are striving than the singing of this wonderful composition.

A Visit to the Cave-Dwellers

TROGLODYTES, or people who live in underground burrows, like moles, or in holes and excavations in the rocks, like the ancient cliff-dwellers in New Mexico and other parts of this continent, are not unknown in other lands. In the September number of the National Geographic Magazine, Mr. Frank E. Johnson has a very interesting and instructive article on the subject. He gives an account of the Troglodytes or "mole men" of South Tunisia. Near the town of Gabes is a good-sized settlement of these cavemen, called Matmata, which comprises several villages. He writes: "The holes or caves vary in depth and width, but average nine metres deep by fifteen metres in circumference. One great hole is used as a 'patio,' or courtyard. Numerous caves dug in the sides of the hole serve as living-rooms and storehouses. One enters these dwellings by means of a passage tunneled through the earth or rock. Some of the ceilings are roughly ornamented with Arabic designs cut in bas-relief in the rock and the dates when the dwellings were dug. None of them seem to go back more than one hundred years and many are not as old, proving that all Troglodytes were originally Climbing Troglodytes, dwelling in caves on the tops of the highest mountain peaks.

"Walking through the passage into the large circular courtyard open to the sky, one sees large caves cut into the walls of the tunnel that serve for storehouses and granaries. Grain will keep here for years in perfect condition. There are also caves for the goats, sheep, and donkeys."

Here follows a description of one of the more notable of these caves:

"Pushing open a door made of palm-tree boards, we entered the sheik's cave. It was white-washed. To the left is a wooden chest and a gun, one of many. Back of the gun is a stand cut out of the rock, and the dark object is an oil lamp—the form dating back to the Greek and Roman days. The white object in the centre is a bedstead cut out of the rock, and there are comfortable mattresses filled with wool, and native blankets or rugs. Above the bedstead is a sort of cupboard. To the right are large oil and water jars. At the back of the cave are couscous covers, the largest one having come from Ghadames. These covers and couscous plates are highly prized and very ornamental. Above the plates and covers is a Persian picture and an Arab almanac.

"The wives of the sheik live in a cave similar to this next to it, and so do the sons and their wives and children. The question of rent is not of great importance. When a youth is strong enough to carry a gun and take care of some sheep or goats, or manage a few camels, he takes to himself a young wife. When a man marries he has to give to the parents of his future bride a gift. These gifts may vary according to the tribe and country.

"Back in the mountain ranges of northern Africa are various tribes of Troglodytes, or cave-dwellers, living to-day about the same as did their ancestors during the life of Christ, and, if Roman and Greek writers are to be believed, these Troglodytes were then considered a curious and ancient people. The Troglodyte town of Chinini has a great reputation for first-class cooks. One man was called to Rome, and was chief pastry cook to Pope Leo XIII."

Mr. Johnson divides these people into three classes, viz.: First, Troglodytes that live under the earth like Matmata; second, Troglodytes that live in caves or dig holes in the hillside; third, Climbing Troglodytes. He adds: "Since I have visited them all and studied them in their homes—slept, eaten, and lived among them—it seems to me they are all originally climbing Troglodytes who have adopted the dwelling and abode best suited to their wants. Almost all of the Troglodytes are semi-nomads, and leave their mountain homes to wander in the plains and deserts that extend from their mountains to the Mediterranean, or pitch their gourbis on some mountain side far away from any village, where their goats and camels can find something to eat."

more than you would think. I had to do most of it by daylight, the sewing was so fine, and I feel as if I had red peppers instead of eyes, they burn so. It's pretty, though, don't you think?"

"Exquisite!" assented the manager warmly. "No, indeed, I don't think fifteen dollars a mite too much. Hand work takes so much care and time! It's a pity there's so little profit on it."

The Exchange charges ten per cent. commission on all sales. Naturally, the larger part of its profits come from the sale of large articles. Its scope is constantly widening, and, in contrast to the thirty poorly made and undesirable articles with which it opened its doors in 1878, the Exchange now occupies three floors, and every room is crowded with the handiwork of the women it strives to aid. Consignments come from all over the United States, from Alaska, Canada and Cuba.

In the eighty-five exchanges in America and Europe, women are finding a use for their varied talents, and enjoying the sweetness of remunerated labor. Some of them are sending early vegetables to market,, some are managing farms, others are decorating houses or keeping ladies' reception rooms in order; some are in the real estate business; others make a business of mending, writing letters, making lace, keeping accounts, shopping for the wealthy. One woman in robust health and vigor, who is ignorant of any kind of woman's work, draws a good salary by taking pet dogs out for an airing every day in the week when the sun shines! A Southern woman who was "land-poor" conceived the thought of furnishing pine cones and "fat kindlings" for the bright fires of city homes. The Exchange finds a quick market for these. "Usually," says one of the experienced members of the Exchange, "our contributors begin their work with no confidence in themselves and a general awe of the buying public. Consequently, their first efforts are in the line of a wide and often futile guess at what other people want—an anxious effort to cater to an unknown taste. But as this unaccustomedness wears away, the character and judgment of the woman come into play. She begins to consider what is satisfactory to herself in the things she buys and uses, or in the things she has bought and used. So faults in the use or purpose of articles are avoided. The best shapes for ease of wear and laundrying are chosen; cheap vulgarities of fragile lace are eliminated, and the product of her industry becomes a satisfactory article."

Standing against the wall, in the main room of the Woman's Exchange in New York, is a handsome cabinet with locked doors. One can peer through the glass panels, and see what lies within. It seems to be a collection of very old and very varied articles. There is an old, old miniature of a young girl in the short-waisted dress of a bygone age; there is a delicately fashioned reading-glass, a neckla rare scrap of lace, a cobweb han chief, a tiny pearl ring. These a old heirlooms, the parting gift friends, the last articles of value have been kept for the "lean ye They are placed in the cabinet sold. A romance lies in each There was a day when a certain uable miniature of a once famous caught the eye of a visitor to the change, and she asked that the ca be opened that she might see it cl It was handed her, and she examin carefully, finally saying: "I want if I can get it at my price." "W said one of the managers dubio "this belongs to one of our cont tors, who is most anxious to ma sale. She is a 'shut-in', and months has been sending in her h work, but nothing of hers has ever sold. This miniature is the last t she wants to part with; but if make an offer, I will see what says." The would-be purchaser itated just an instant, her eyes admiringly and lovingly on the quisite coloring and delicate b work of the old miniature, and asked: "Need she sell this then i other work were bought?" "Per not for the present," was the co reply, and the answer came quic "Then, in place of this, I will bu the work she has done—the work has not yet been sold. And," she a "if it has been reduced in price, I it at the original sum asked."

This is not charity. It is the love. And it is on this principle the Woman's Exchange, a prac philanthropy, hopes to rise to its h est power.

National Reformation*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

WE have missed nearly half the Bible's message in that many such passages, which really apply to national sin and national repentance and national restoration, have commonly been quoted as if God dealt only with individuals. The revivalist cuts off at a comma God's summons of a nation to judgment: "Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel." The judgment day of nations comes in this world, and the tribes of Israel were "lost" forever in the land of captivity, from which they never returned. A "remnant" of Judah, however, came back from captivity, singing such songs through their four months' journey toward Jerusalem as that of our lesson, and claimed for their "sinful nation" that snow promise of Isaiah that has seldom been applied, as Isaiah meant it, to the purifying of politics, the cleansing of a "sinful nation": "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow." The most appropriate place for that text is under a whitening Prohibition map of the United States, or a whitening missionary map of the world. That promise means more than a white life for one, or "a white life for two"; it means a white country and a white world.

It is a good promise to grip on when the Christian patriot is almost hopeless of national "salvation." That is what salvation usually means in the Bible—"the salvation of Israel." Isaiah, the prophet who uses it most, speaks of the same thing as the good news, the Gospel, which has also been belittled as if it concerned individuals only, when it means nothing less than a Christianized community (Luke 4: 16). "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me"—that is the personal part; but that is only the seed of the Gospel. The full-grown tree is a community where blind asylums, prison reform, emancipation of slaves, and social justice between weak and strong, rich and poor, make up in social justice an "acceptable year" of our Lord.

I. Our Nation Should Repent and Return from Captivity

Like Rome before it fell, most of our people seem to care for little just now save "bread and games." The picture in the chapters of Isaiah of the sins that sickened Judah and killed Israel seems like a snap-shot of our own present social conditions. A sense of personal sin seems to-day almost a lost art. But a sense of social sin, so prominent all through the prayers of Bible prophets—the recognition that a whole church, a whole city, a whole nation may be unitedly guilty of wrong doing—that can hardly be conceived in our individualistic age. What everybody does nobody does, in the common view.

Let us pray that those Christian qualities of our national character which were so notable in the past may be restored. Neither in pulpit nor in private is there enough prayer for the nation—indeed, save in the services of one denomination, on rare occasions one hardly hears a prayer for the President or Congress; for governor or legislature or mayor or city council; for the responsible master of them all, the Sovereign Citizen, whose ballot is a sceptre, to be received with solemn awe as at a coronation, and used with a sense of deep responsibility to God, to the home and to humanity. There are few heresies so wicked as one generally believed by Christians, that politics belong outside their sphere. Would that we could induce all Sunday School teachers to read The New Citizenship, by Professor S. Z. Batten, which pictures the State as God's "institute of right relations" and politics as "the science of social welfare," which aims at "the achievement of a social order in which the ideals of humanity shall be realized." "Patriotism is that deep strong passion for the higher, larger interests of the people." May there come such civic revivals in our land that we may soon adopt the songs of returning Judah, and sing:

Jehovah, thou hast been favorable unto thy land.
Thou hast brought back the captivity of Jacob.
Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people.
Thou hast covered all their sin.

II. Men and Women May Return from Captivity

What we have said thus far interprets the lesson's most direct and deepest meaning; but we will not forget that if the nation will not yet repent God will bring back from the captivity of sin, with songs of deliverance, every repentant soul. All Old Testament history can be summed up in those words which recur so often in Judges: "Evil," "Distress," "Deliverance." Sin always brings sorrow. It is one of the shallowest confidence games in the world, and ought to deceive no one. It is but the spinning red hook, for which the fish leaps, only to add to it the red of his blood and die in captivity. Sin always involves such injustice and ingratitude to God and man that when a man "comes to himself" he despises himself for his meanness. He sees he has given neither God nor man a square deal. This "godly sorrow," that is, God-like sorrow, of repentance is really a step toward joy, for the penitent is digging for the foundations to make himself a temple of God. In a square look at his own need, he is making room for God and the joy of restoration.

The essential thing in repentance is not sorrow for sin, but turning from it, for repentance means turning again or returning; coming back to Jerusalem from captivity.

In the park about the national capitol there has been some wonderful tree surgery of late. Imagine a man having his diseased backbone and breast bone removed, and some nonliving substance put in their place, and the almost severed halves of the body bolted together, and life going on through it all, and he flourishing "like a green bay tree" ever after. That is what has been done to one tree so decayed that almost anywhere else it would have been cut down or left to be ripped asunder by wind or thunderbolt in the first great storm. The tree is saved, but shall bear its ugly scars forever. This salvation of a hard case, apparently a hopeless case among the trees, is more than matched in thousands of transformations of men and women, who, reaching the state of utter misery in sin, and almost of despair, have heard the story of some other sinner saved, and have seized the hope thus thrown to them, and by a combination of divine and human forces have been changed in mind and soul and body, in a conversion that is also a resurrection.

III. Children Should Avoid Being Led Into Captivity

In the classes of boys and girls, who make up the major part of our Sunday Schools, it may not be best to spend so much time on either national or personal restoration from the bitter captivity of sin as on ways of keeping out of captivity. The captivity of the Jews in Babylon, who were not slaves but only subjects, like the people of India, was far too mild to picture the captivity of sin. Even the

Peace Circles Discuss War

THERE never has been a time since the inauguration of the Peace Movement when peace soldiers should so dauntlessly stand by their principles. The efforts to further peace on earth should be redoubled. Where heretofore we have held one meeting, we should now be holding two and three meetings to discuss the pros and cons of war and peace.

The black war-cloud upon the horizon will be dispelled by the sunlight of truth and justice, never fear. Italy by her precipitate course has so far succeeded only in shocking the world, and the peace-loving element of the civilized nations unanimously cry, "Shame! Shame!"

Because a nation keen with the greed of conquest and an overreaching desire to extend the sphere of its national influence has seen fit to tear down the barriers erected by the conventions to prevent just such catastrophes is no reason why we should lose heart or believe the World's Peace Movement to be powerless against the human nature of nations. Such peremptory actions on the part of Italy and the Ottoman Empire, though they are both signatories, casts no "unmistakable imputation of hypocrisy" upon the Hague Treaties. Seldom in the annals of warfare has a war been so universally denounced; never has Peace advocacy been so strengthened. It is as though war itself, by boldly showing itself futile, expensive, dispiriting, paralyzing, argued before the world for peace.

The Voice of the People

Depressed markets, disorganized finance, unsettled commercial conditions, paralyzed industries and a threatened burden of war tax has aroused the people. The recent general uprising of five hundred thousand workingmen in Germany manifesting displeasure at the idea of war with France; the mass meetings in Italy to-day led by the Socialists, and a general awakening, throughout civilized countries, of the masses, manifests clearly enough that the people are alive to the fact that it is upon their shoulders the actual burden of warfare falls heaviest. It is from the masses that armies are equipped; it is the workingmen who are to serve in conscript armies. They and their families would not only lose the wages earned in times of peace, but death and disablement contingent upon war result widely in the rank and file. The advantages that might be gained even by a successful war are in the minds of the masses everywhere clearly outweighed by the losses.

PAPER-BAG COOKERY

Marion Harland writes in Cooking Revolutionized: "It seems preposterous to say that almost everything can be cooked in paper bags, on a broiler, in any and every kind of oven, and that food thus cooked is undeniably more savory than food cooked in other ways, but such is beyond a doubt the case, as has been proved by the adoption of the method on the grand scale in England and the colonies. The inventor and perfector of the method is Nicholas Soyer, chef of Brooks' Club, London, and grandson of Soyer the greatest of Franco-English Cordons Bleus. The method is fully explained in Nicholas Soyer's book, Paper-Bag Cookery, just published."

Margaret Sangster writes: "When the phrase 'paper-bag cookery' was first mentioned in my hearing I imagined it to be a new variety of picnic convenience. It now transpires that paper-bag cookery has been introduced into English homes by a noted London chef, and its wave of popularity has literally swept across the United Kingdom. On this side of the Atlantic the idea will probably meet with immediate approval and acceptance, the fact being that almost everything on the table may be prepared to excellent advantage if inserted in a paper bag. The article to be cooked, whether roast or broiled meat, chicken or vegetable, is placed in the bag, which completely envelopes it, and is folded in such a way that none of the juices escape in the cooking process."

The great advantage of paper-bag cooking over all other methods is the elimination of the pots and pans, and the terrible trouble of cleaning them, the getting rid of odors and other undesirable features with which every housekeeper is familiar.

We will send you the book, Soyer's Paper-Bag Cookery, with a package of two dozen different-sized paper bags, entirely free if you will send us one new subscription for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $1.50; and we will send entirely free to the new subscriber a copy of our 1912 Almanac, containing valuable and interesting information on many topics, with stories, poems and anecdotes, making altogether a most delightful book.

slavery which holds only the body captive, while the soul may be free and glad, does not fully illustrate the condition of one on whose soul are the chains of selfishness and hatred and envy and jealousy and covetousness; or whose body is held in a vice by some habit—which means "it has you," that is, some thing is master of a man. Many a boy is like Gulliver, mastered by the Liliputians, for he is really the captive of his cigarette. God made men and animals to be masters of all vegetable forms, but this boy—and some men, too—is the helpless slave of a weed, and a chopped-up weed at that. In these days of many "habit-forming drugs," when ninety drinks condemned by the United States Bureau of Chemistry are sold at the soda fountains, every boy should write large in the front of his memory Sir Isaac Newton's motto, "I make myself no necessities." And there are three other good mottoes with which to bar the tempting road to captivity:

Nothing is true pleasure that is not pleasant to remember.

A good time is one that does not go off with the having.

Self-denial is self-love living for the future.

Missions in Europe*

TURKEY, one of the world's most difficult mission fields, is just now of peculiar interest. The war with Italy has halted hopeful reforms, may lead to fresh outrages. Even before this sudden war-panic, letters were in a bad way there. Callers that the Albanian language should be laid aside for the Turkish were received sullenly and but half-employed. The people are emigrating in large numbers to America, and we shall now have a chance to do effective mission work with them, close at hand. The missionaries consider, however, that in the active work upon the physical development of the state, they will receive great benefit, if the war does not prevent. Automobiling has struck the fancy of the rich Turks, and measures are on foot tending toward a system of good roads throughout the empire. Railroads are in process of building. The natural resources of the empire are being developed, and education is becoming more general and more prized. In all these signs of the times, the missionaries find great cause for encouragement, for transportation both for themselves and their Bibles will soon be easier, and a higher state of intelligence will open the minds of the people to the reception of the truth.

In many of our foreign mission fields, much is made of conferences. Often a week of prayer accompanies or precedes them. The Rev. Edward C. Haskell, long one of our most efficient workers in Salonica, describes in glowing terms such an one, which was held not long ago at Monospitovo. So much interest was awakened that the meetings were prolonged for four weeks. Many were converted, the auditoriums were packed to the doors, and "long years of spiritual drought were followed by showers of blessing." Christians were alarmed in some quarters at the news, apparently authentic, that the Moslems were making, in 1910, a determined effort to obtain a footing in England. It was said that they were securing many converts; but a thorough investigation has shown that though a man claiming to be a Moslem missionary was really holding "meetings" in London, he accomplished nothing and only a few stragglers rallied round his standard. The civilized common sense of the twentieth century Anglo-Saxon cannot possibly stoop to the absurdities of Mohammedanism.

Russia has long been a most discouraging field for evangelical effort. Strict edicts forbade the gathering of Protestants in any public place, and even now they are held under protest, and are broken up upon the slightest pretext. Actual persecution of the evangelical pastors has prevailed, the Baptists being especially singled out for such treatment. The recent great Baptist gathering in Philadelphia discussed the situation, and laid plans for an extension of the work.

The Danish Missionary Society is doing a good work in Greenland. Norwegian Christians are sending missionaries to Madagascar, to the Zulus and to China. Sweden is also working in Zululand, and also in China, in Turkestan and in Russia. They have a medical mission in Bethlehem and a crowded school in Jerusalem. Even little Finland is sending out missionaries by the score. Unfortunately Greece prohibits the circulation of the Bible in the native vernacular. Says the Missionary Review: What this means to the national and spiritual life of Greece, let those say who, during the present year, have joined together all over the world in thanking God for three hundred years of a vernacular English Bible."

Abstinence and Prosperity*

IN one of our great cities there is a pleasant street on which stand two beautiful houses. Broad lawns surround them. In the rear of each is a bright garden. They are famous in the neighborhood as "the two houses which Jack Thorburn drank up." He was left a generous sum by a rich uncle. The major part of his legacy he invested in these fine houses. In one of them he himself lived for some years, but the awful thirst of the drunkard possessed him. He became unfit for his business and was obliged to move into a cheap house and mortgage his other property. Little by little, the saloon-keeper gained control of both of those beautiful homes. Into one of them he moved his own family. It took less than ten years to accomplish the transfer. Frequenters of that saloon said that poor Jack was urged by the liquor-seller to drink more and more and more, as the two houses approached nearer and nearer to his ownership. The pictures which these conditions summon to mind are almost too horrible to think of.

But there are really no pictures connected with wine and liquor which are pleasant.

A lady went not long ago to a dinner where a different sort of wine was served with almost every one of the nine or ten courses, as often happens at fine dinners. She herself never drank wine. The faces of the other guests, as is usually the case, flushed more and more, and their tongues flew faster and faster as the dinner proceeded. All were refined and highly educated, but they laughed more loudly than was their custom when not under the influence of wine, and they said many foolish things.

For instance, a young man of high intellectual ability took his seat beside this sober lady (the only really sober one present) and remarked with a foolish smile, "Do you prefer Asia or Africa?"

"Really," she replied, "I have no choice."

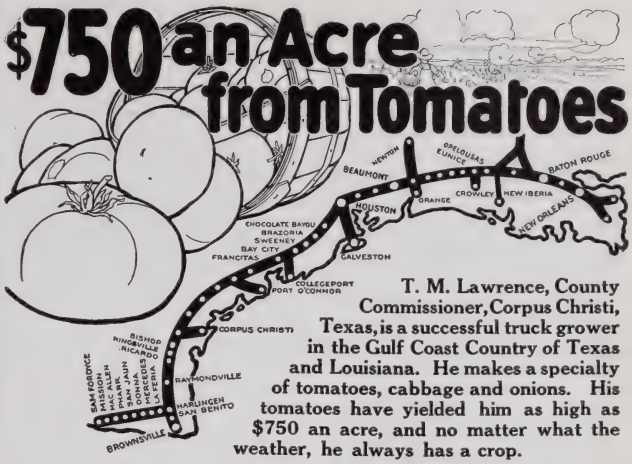
"Oh!" he said apologetically. "Some prefer Africa."

Now, although this poor fellow was not what is called "intoxicated," yet he was certainly making an absurd spectacle of himself.

When this lady, in the hope of impressing a friend of hers with the folly, if not the immorality, of drinking wine at dinner, related this incident, the friend proved her imperviousness to argument by saying, "Well, you should have taken the wine in a well-bred way, as the others did, and then they would not have seemed so silly to you."

"You think it would have been better that we should all have been silly together?" asked the lady.

"Certainly," responded the obstinate one. "Far better."



One wonders how people can so degrade their reason as to argue thus.

Mention has been made in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the admirable little book upon the effects of alcohol, by H. S. Williams, M.D., LL.D., published in New York by the Century Company. It marshals an array of unanswerable facts and arguments to show that alcohol is very seldom a help to the human system, and is usually an injury. A new and powerful statement of the same sort was made lately in Harper's Weekly, by the distinguished chemist and physician, Dr. Norman Ditman. Experiments and researches are described, which throw a flood of new light upon this problem.

$750 an Acre from Tomatoes

T. M. Lawrence, County Commissioner, Corpus Christi, Texas, is a successful truck grower in the Gulf Coast Country of Texas and Louisiana. He makes a specialty of tomatoes, cabbage and onions. His tomatoes have yielded him as high as $750 an acre, and no matter what the weather, he always has a crop.

How about your income? Is it as big or as sure as Mr. Lawrence's? If he can make $750 an acre, others can make good money. If you had only 10 acres and made $750 an acre wouldn't you feel pretty comfortable and independent? Any man with ordinary intelligence can manage 10 acres. After you get started you will want more. Better investigate this at once, don't wait until someone else gets your job before you break away. Go down to the Gulf Coast Country of Texas and Louisiana and become your own boss. Lead a healthful out-door life on your own land and lay money away in the bank.

Investigate this Wonderful Country

The trip down there, via the Frisco, is worth the little cost of going. On the first and third Tuesdays of each month, round trip fares, via the Frisco Lines to the Gulf Coast Country of Texas and Louisiana, are very low. Chicago $37.50, St. Louis and Kansas City $32.50, Birmingham $37.50, New Orleans and Baton Rogue $20 or less. To many points the fare will be even less.

The Frisco Lines operate splendid, electric lighted, all steel trains, daily from Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, Birmingham and New Orleans. Every day in the year these trains carry through cars to the Gulf Coast Country and on excursion days have through tourist sleepers to the Gulf Coast Country.

Three Splendid Books FREE

beast to be held under lock and key. When a young tough familiar with the old type of reform school is brought into the Parental School, he undoubtedly has the surprise of his life. His universe turns upside down, and everything proceeds by the law of opposites. No clanging, huge iron doors shut off the world. Around the buildings, on the top of a country hill, there is not even a fence.

"Jack," says Mr. Todd, "I'm going to give you a square deal." And Jack gets it, for probably the first time in his life; and probably he has had more than his share of blows, and has pictured the Parental School as a house of terror. He finds himself in a school—and a mighty nice one at that—where he had expected a jail.

"Wot a cinch!" he breathes, with a deep sense of relief, as he is taken into one of the homelike cottages and given in charge of a kindly-faced woman, who takes him down to the basement. Here he is given a shower bath and a complete outfit of clean clothes. Then the woman who will for the next six or seven months be everything to him that his own mother should have been gives him a towel, tooth-brush, comb and other useful necessaries which have previously been unknown to Jack's domestic economy. He notices that all these things bear the number 20. He asks the reason. "Everything in this house that you find bearing that number belongs to you," says the matron, who shows him a neat little locker in which to keep his clothes. "You'll have a uniform in a few days if you are good," she says.

"'Keep the boys occupied' is my motto," said Mr. Todd, as he showed me over the school. "Keep them so busy that when night comes they are so physically tired that they can sleep. Work and the 'square deal' are the only important things. From six o'clock in the morning till six o'clock at night they are busy with some form of occupation. On Saturday they are continuously busy from six in the morning till three in the afternoon, when they are allowed time for recreation. On Sundays there is a five or ten mile walk on the programme, sandwiched in, in cold weather, with occasional conferences with a neighboring woodpile. There is plenty of work of this sort ahead, as some thousand chestnut trees have to be cut down. Now, you know, boys can't go through that sort of training for six months or more without getting some good out of it. It may not tell now, but will later on. The net education cost is only $3.64 per week, and when we get our full capacity it will be less. Now just consider that proposition for a minute. When you place a misguided youth in one of our Flushing cottages you render unnecessary the services of the truant officer, the policeman, and the Children's Court. In the course of six months or so a little street loafer, a prospective criminal or vagrant, is changed into a worker or a prospective trader, who in a working life of fifty years may be expected to earn at least $25,000. And so, from the standpoint of the dollar alone, the Parental School is a proposition with infinite possibilities of future profit to the community.

"I work on the reverse principle in applying suggestions. For example, if I made military training a part of the discipline they would all hate it. But when it is explained that the wearing of the uniform is to give a smarter appearance, and when it is applied solely as a reward of merit, then they all want it. Corporal punishment is not allowed here, and the youngsters are never 'licked.' For a minor offense a boy will be deprived of his uniform and compelled to attend drill between two boy policemen, or he will be deprived of attending the Saturday night stereopticon lecture. For a serious offense a boy's whole house will be kept standing on the line for a couple of hours a day without uniform unless the guilty one confesses. You may depend upon it," said Mr. Todd, with a merry twinkle in his eye, "that the guilty boy's housemates generally see to it that he confesses."

"What part of your training yields the best result?" I asked Mr. Todd.

"No one department more than another," he replied. "I have never yet had a boy who kicked at hard work. They want it, and if their energies had been rightly directed in the first place they would never have got here. We civilize the boy by cultivating a proper respect for law and order, and impressing upon him the uselessness and consequences of disobedience. He is taught the habit of work, the virtue of self-control, and the necessity for personal integrity. That is what the Parental School does for him. Here is what he does for the Parental School. He helps to make annually 65,000 loaves of bread, helps to launder 300,000 pieces of linen, helps to make plumbing and carpentry repairs about the school, helps to raise 1,900 bushels of potatoes, 8,000 heads of cabbage, 400 bushels of yellow corn, 14,400 ears of sweet corn, 500 bushels of tomatoes, and hundreds of bushels of smaller vegetables. He does most all of the housework in the cottages, even the mending. In the tailor shop he helps to make summer and winter uniforms and sundry other articles. He does all the school printing and some of the printing for the Board of Education.

Mr. Todd is a great believer in the benefit of allowing the boys a place in which they can "let off steam." In the basement of each cottage is a large play room, absolutely devoid of furniture, with a concrete floor, where the boys can play shuffle board, hand ball, or have boxing matches, after the dinner hour or before going to bed.

In the administration building there are ten well-equipped class rooms, the walls of which are covered with specimens of the pupils' work, handwriting, drawings, water colors, maps, and specimens of articles such as cushion covers, waste paper baskets, which have been made by the boys, many of whom when they came to the school could neither read nor write.

Not the least interesting phase of the Parental School is its boy policemen. Picked boys take turns at policing the grounds, and see to it that no boy breaks any of the few simple rules of the institution. John Smith, one of the new boys, stole a penknife from another boy before he had absorbed the true spirit of the school. He was promptly hauled off to Mr. Todd's office by a squad of boy "cops." Mr. Todd suggested, with a smile, that "you handle the case yourselves." So John was taken before a boy court and was sentenced by a solemn boy judge to receive a sound pummeling, and it was forthwith administered. The boy judge on such occasions dispenses justice with an impartiality and discrimination that seems incredible until one remembers how well boys know one another. Punishment is always put where the culprits feel it most!

Occasionally a sneak thief from a neighboring village, or a tramp, steals into the grounds in ignorance of the character of the place. There are many fruit trees on the estate, which the boys guard with jealous eyes, for the fruit is equally distributed when ripe. A couple of tramps last summer were discovered by Jerry, a boy policeman, with about two quarts of cherries. With a howl of virtuous indignation Jerry (who, by the way, was sent to the school from the Children's Court for carrying a loaded gun and playing havoc generally with the entire decalogue) leaped on to the cherry thief. The latter was an Italian, and whipped out a knife, thinking to terrify the boy. But it takes more than a knife to faze a New York street arab, and Jerry was soon grappling with the thief. Meanwhile, several of the other boys came up and between them made short work of the Italian, who was literally dragged across the fields into Mr. Todd's office.

"I knew," said Mr. Todd, "that if I turned the man over to the local authorities I would have to waste a lot of valuable time in appearing against him. 'You come along with me,' I said to the fellow, and, with a couple of boys on each side of him, we marched him down to the first cottage and into the basement. It was play time, and as I pushed him through the door I said to the boys, 'Here is a cherry thief.' That was enough. They just pounced on him, and dragged him into the bath room. They turned on the cold water and held him under the shower with his clothes on until he was pretty nearly drowned; then they took him upstairs and told him to get out. He ran as if Old Nick was after him, and the boys chased him clear off the grounds and for about a mile down the road. I have never seen him since, nor have I had any more trouble with sneak thieves."

Let the Weather Regulate Your Furnace. You need not watch your furnace or think about the drafts if you have a Halsey Heat Regulator in your living room. You simply set the Regulator at the temperature you wish to maintain in the house. Just as soon as the weather outside begins to get colder, and just in proportion as it gets colder, the draft begins to open—as the temperature moderates, it closes.

The action is absolutely automatic. A change of one degree lifts the chain that operates the draft one inch.

Saves coal and repairs. It lessens fire risk. Makes a comfortable, healthy house.

McCall's Magazine

The greatest woman's fashion journal in America. Has over one million subscribers —more than any other similar publication. Besides showing all the latest designs of McCall Patterns, each issue is brimful of sparkling short stories and most helpful information for women. McCall's is a large, artistic, handsomely illustrated hundred-page monthly periodical that no woman can afford to be without. If you wish to save money and keep in style, subscribe for McCall's Magazine at once. Any one of the celebrated McCall Patterns (value 15 cents) free with each subscription. Select your free pattern from your first number of McCall's. McCall Patterns have established a national reputation for the facility with which they may be used and the accurate instructions given.

The Housewife

The Housewife is pre-eminently a magazine for the woman who has the care and development of her home at heart. The Housewife has more interesting and entertaining stories than any other magazine of a similar class. The stories are always wholesome and are replete with suggestions for home decoration, entertainment and amusement. It is the largest and best magazine for women published at a popular price and for many years has been recognized as the foremost woman's household magazine by hundreds of thousands of readers. It is handsomely printed and always has a beautifully colored cover design drawn by some famous artist of national reputation. The Housewife is always interesting, entertaining, cheerful, helpful and clean.

People's Home Journal

By bringing good literature within the reach of the reading public of this country, The People's Home Journal has probably done more than any other popular fiction and home magazine to help build up the American home into the great national bulwark that it is to-day. For the past twenty-five years fathers and mothers have looked to The People's Home Journal for their reading and the reading for their children. This magazine has had a wonderful influence for good in every one of the homes—almost a million—into which it goes. It has become famous for its brilliant serial and short stories. Then you will also find all kinds of departments to cover a multitude of home subjects, such as cooking, care of children, entertainment, latest styles in clothing and newest fashions in needlework.

Pictorial Review

claims pre-eminence among women's magazines for four reasons: First, for its fashions, which are easily the most up-to-date, correct and most practical of any magazine published anywhere. Second, for its common-sense, essentially helpful, practical home and household departments, which cover the whole field of housekeeping and its problems. Pictorial Review devotes more space to this subject than any other magazine in this country. Third, for the wealth and interest of its art and literary sections. Pictorial Review stories are good stories, better and more interesting, stronger stories than you are apt to find in the pages of other women's magazines. Fourth, last, but not least, for its uplifting, instructive special articles bearing on home problems by the best and most popular writers.

American Boy

Give it to your boy. It will appeal more to his finer sensibilities than the tawdry, soon-forgotten gifts. The American Boy is the finest educator a youth can have. It develops his sense of honor, manliness and morality. It trains him to live and think right. The American Boy contains stories written by men who understand the American boy—stories of adventure, skill, travel, history, biography and world events, beautifully illustrated. It is the biggest, brightest and best magazine for boys in all the world. The American Boy is eagerly read by 500,000 intelligent, manly American boys. Your boy ought to be allowed to have his own magazine, all to himself. This is the one—add it to your own "grown up" list, and make your son happy.

Farm Journal

is the standard farm and home paper of America: made for housekeepers, boys and girls, as well as fruit-growers, truckers, poultrymen, stockmen, dairymen, suburbanites and village people. It has always "stood up" for women. It is clean, brief, bright, "boiled down," intensely practical. "Cream, not skim-milk," is its motto. It is thirty-three years old, and known everywhere. "Judge Biggie" and "Peter Tumbledown" are characters better known to many than Hamlet or Micawber. Its poultry department is famous.

Modern Priscilla

First, last and all the time, the best Fancy Work Magazine published in America, if not in the world. A practical instructor and reliable adviser in every branch of feminine handicraft known to women, including all kinds of embroidery, crochet, knitting, lace, bead work, basketry, stenciling, oil, water-color and china painting, art leather work, art brass work, pyrography, etc. Every number is profusely illustrated with beautiful original designs and full-size details of stitches. Besides fancy work, The Modern Priscilla provides its readers specially edited departments for mothers, with suggestions for home kindergarten work and stories for the little ones; for housekeepers, with many a good recipe and "helpful" gabore; for the hostess, with helpful ideas and suggestions; for the home dressmaker, with practical instructions, and a fashion and pattern department second to none; and for the woman who values her personal appearance, with "beauty" suggestions that all can apply.

Lowest Price Magazine Club Offers

The present season, 1911-1912, shows many changes in our magazine clubbing offers. A number of publishers have found it necessary, because of improved magazines and increased cost, to raise their prices. The popular $1.00-a-year magazines have, within the last year or so, all been advanced in price to $1.50 per year, and 15 cents per copy. Our old contracts with these publications have expired, and their wholesale rates to us have been increased. We are, therefore, unable to duplicate many of the offers of last year. However, we still lead in offering our subscribers the very lowest priced magazine bargains. Our 1912 Almanac is Free with each Christian Herald subscription.

McCALL'S
HOUSEWIFE
PEOPLE'S HOME JOURNAL

These Magazines are the very best publications in their field. They are all clean and refined, each excluding objectionable advertising, and we have no hesitancy in recommending each of them to our readers. They have made great strides during the past couple of years in editorial contents and general appearance. The move of the old popular $1 magazines to higher prices has given these journals a big impetus and an opportunity which they have been quick to seize. All three magazines in Group One will, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, give more reading matter than any one magazine in Group Three with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and will cost less money.

N.B.—We will cheerfully refund the money paid should you be disappointed in your selection of any one of these magazines.

We especially call attention to the descriptions of these publications on the margins of this page. Of the entire group perhaps the Pictorial Review has made the greatest strides within the last couple of years. It has improved immensely in editorial quality, and is one of the most interesting publications in the woman's field. The Metropolitan has undergone a radical change in character as well as size. Its plans for the coming year are extremely interesting. The Success Magazine has undergone many changes during the past year. It is now under new management, and it will continue to be one of the most valuable magazines in its field. The American Boy, Little Folks, and Modern Priscilla are all old favorites with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. See their descriptions on the margins.

Little Folks

Love and joy and goodness will be presented in stories of real and imaginary children and creatures and things. Besides the charming stories and pictures, there will be suggestions to keep them happily busy in beneficial work or joyous play. The child will love the magazine, and will remember the donor with gratitude. Little Folks tells stories that are intense in interest, fascinating in fancy, charming in childishness, amazingly amusing, and real. Its pictures are delightful, artistic and numerous.

Current Literature

Current Literature is an illustrated review of the large events and important utterances of the month. It is so in touch with the changing world that even its editor cannot tell what subjects will be treated by it one month ahead. The great currents of thought and action, in politics and industry, in science and religion, in literature and the drama, are all brilliantly mirrored in its pages. It sweeps the whole field, in both hemispheres, as no other magazine in the world has ever before done, and gives you the interpretations on all sides of all vital questions. The chief departments of Current Literature are: A Review of the World, which is a comprehensive review of the news of the times by the editor-in-chief. This is the chief feature of the magazine and one of surpassing interest and value. Then come Persons in the Foreground; Science and Discovery; Music and Drama, and Religion and Ethics.

World Evangel

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are Sunday School teachers or scholars should not fail to include The World Evangel in their combination magazine orders. The Evangel is the leading Sunday School magazine. It makes teaching delightful and effective, its fund of anecdotes enabling the teacher to interest scholars of all grades. Its International Lesson Study Department provides the best available exposition and information, and its lesson-teaching department is divided into Adult, Intermediate and Primary Departments. Comment on International Graded Lessons (Primary, Junior, first, second, or third year, and Intermediate first and second year furnished, if desired). In addition to the lesson comment, by specialists, it presents the most successful methods and news. Margaret Slattery is a contributor. The Evangel will save time and increase your efficiency.

Success

The only home magazine that is not a woman's publication, a children's paper or a farm journal. It has recently been combined with the National Post and the united magazine for 1912 promises a remarkable assortment of strong, live articles on the questions of the hour, and stories by our best fiction writers, old and new. Among the magazine's special features for 1912 are Orison Swett Marden's inspiring editorial articles; a vigorous, readable review every month of the world's leading events and chat about the striking personalities of the hour: Mrs. Curtis's Home Corner and Pin Money Papers for women readers, twelve fearless, progressive editorials on the questions before the people; hints to prospective investors; and, by no means least welcome to our readers, a page of the month's best anecdotes.

Review of Reviews

Fifty magazines condensed for busy people. Always necessary, it is absolutely indispensable in these times of stirring public affairs, to the man who thinks and wants to know what is going on around him. It brings together the best that is in all the other important magazines and explains, through Albert Shaw's timely editorials, political issues, persons and all noteworthy events which you must know about. It is always fully informed, interestingly written and splendidly illustrated. Because, as they say, "they cannot do without it," intelligent men and women have given the Review of Reviews the largest subscription list in the world among the magazines not publishing fiction. The "Progress of the World" and "Leading Articles of the Month" are two of the most important features of each issue.

Metropolitan

The new Metropolitan is now issued in a new size, 10¾ x 14 inches. The new size means not only a change in outward aspect, but an entire change in editorial policy is embodied in the new spirit which will permeate its pages. First of all, it will not be a muckraking or sensational magazine. Its dominant note will be to deal with the important affairs of every-day life by such as Peter Finley Dunne and Angus McSween. In addition to their work there will be many special articles from special contributors in the field of travel, finance and science. The new Metropolitan will be especially strong in fiction. A new serial by Maurice Hewlett, stories by Gouverneur Morris, Arnold Bennett, etc., speak for the high quality in general of the new spirit which will make a new magazine of the Metropolitan.

Outlook

During the coming year the Outlook will be of more importance to you than even during the last, as the discussions in the political field will be of greater interest, due to the approaching presidential election and the outcome of the Taft policies. Of course, Mr. Roosevelt will write in his trenchant editorials on great public questions of the day. In these articles he will continue to discuss the movements for clean politics, honest business, and popular rule. Not even the editors of the Outlook themselves agree with all that Mr. Roosevelt writes, but every one must agree that what he writes commands attention. You will enjoy the Outlook, for it is unquestionably one of the best edited and illustrated periodicals in existence. Do not forget that the Outlook, with its 52 issues, includes the 12 double magazine numbers.

QUEEN OF SHEBA'S VISIT TO KING SOLOMON

THE QUEEN OF SHEBA'S VISIT TO KING SOLOMON is one of the most famous incidents in the history of the ancient world. The oriental magnificence of King Solomon's Court brought forth the exclamation, "The half has never been told." The beautiful picture shown herewith, from Ridpath's History, illustrates but ONE event out of all the THOUSANDS that make up the history of every nation, ancient and modern, all accurately and entertainingly told in the world-famed publication

Ridpath's History of the World

CHRISTIAN HERALD READERS have shown wonderful appreciation of our Special Offer. The work is endorsed by great Statesmen and Preachers, University and all College Presidents, and by the American people, as the best History ever written. It may well be said of the merits of this splendid work, in the words of the illustrious Queen, "The half has never been told!" We are now closing out the remainder of the last edition at a great sacrifice in price.

PRESIDENT McKINLEY said:
"I am familiar with the merits of Ridpath's History of the World, and cordially commend it to the scholar as well as to the plain people generally."

BISHOP VINCENT said:
"Ridpath's History is in clear and agreeable style, comprehensive in treatment, readable type and admirable illustrations. This set of books is a permanent college chair of general history in one's own house."

BISHOP NEWMAN said:
"In reading Ridpath I experience the pleasure often realized when looking at some grand panorama. The superb pictures of temples, palaces, scenes, events and men add a charm to the clear and vigorous style of the learned author."

PRESIDENT HARRISON said:
"The author's labors are deserving of the highest praise. The printing and binding are first class and the illustrations are numerous and of a high order. I most heartily recommend this great work for study and convenient reference.

LEW WALLACE said:
"I have not words to sufficiently recommend Professor Ridpath's 'History of the World.' The author has done his work in the most thorough and interesting manner. No library is complete without it.

NINE MASSIVE VOLUMES 4000 PAGES 2000 ILLUSTRATIONS

DR. Ridpath gives the history of every religion of mankind, and shows the slow but sure progress that has been made from Paganism to Christianity, from darkness to light. The customs and habits of people, the development of their science and literature and art, the growth of religion and education form a very vital part of this history, and that which gives the work its lasting popularity is the wonderfully beautiful and fascinating style in which it is written. To read this work is not only to increase one's fund of knowledge, but to improve the literary style in which we write or speak, and to expand and develop the mental powers.

EVERY American citizen should know the history of his own country and of the world to intelligently perform his full duty as a citizen in the government of this Nation. How else are we to judge of the great national questions that crowd upon us for decision except by some knowledge of the past? For the answer read the history of mighty Babylon, or of imperial Rome as a kingdom, then as a republic, and finally as an empire, and familiarize yourself with her growth, development and decay. Then, when you know the cause of the rise and downfall of empires and nations, will you be able to intelligently discuss and decide the great questions that are pressing everywhere for attention.

RIDPATH takes you back to the dawn of history, long before the pyramids of Egypt were built; down through the romantic troubled times of Chaldea's grandeur and Assyria's magnificence; of Babylonia's wealth and luxury; of Grecian and Roman splendor; of Mohammedan culture and refinement; of French elegance and British power; of American patriotism and religious freedom, to the dawn of yesterday. He covers every race, every nation, every time, and holds you spellbound by his wonderful eloquence. Nothing more interesting, absorbing and inspiring was ever written.

RIDPATH throws the mantel of personality over the old heroes of history. Alexander is there—patriot, warrior, statesman, diplomat, crowning the glory of Grecian history. Xerxes, from his mountain platform, sees Themistocles, with three hundred and fifty Greek ships, smash his Persian fleet of over a thousand sail, and help to mould the language in which this paragraph is written. Rome perches Nero upon the greatest throne on earth, and so sets up a poor madman's name to stand for countless centuries as the synonym of savage cruelty; Napoleon fights Waterloo again under your very eyes, and reels before the iron fact that at last the end of his gilded dream has come. Bismarck is there—gruff, overbearing, a giant pugilist in the diplomatic ring, laughing with grim disdain at France, which says "You shall not." Washington is there, "four-square to all the winds," grave, thoughtful, proof against the wiles of British strategy and the poisoned darts of false friends; clear-seeing over the heads of his fellow-countrymen, and on into another century—the most colossal world-figure of his time!

Questions and Answers

T. E. W., Stratton, Neb. In your issue of September 27 you discuss the Lord's Prayer. Now, my Bible does not read "on earth," but "in earth." An old minister explained to me years ago that "in earth" meant "in us"—our bodies being earth.

We regard the construction as strained and unwarranted. Most Bible versions preferably have "on earth," but the best scholarship holds the two forms of expression as interchangeable, "in earth" being as though one should say "in the world." The passage has no relation to our individual material bodies, although it can properly be held to refer to the whole human race, who should be submissive and obedient to God, and endeavor to carry out his will.

Mrs. M. E. C., Washington, D. C. I am informed that the same Greek words in the early copies of the New Testament are translated sometimes "Holy Spirit," and sometimes "Holy Ghost." By whom was this distinction first made and on what grounds?

This question has been referred to Rev. Bernhard Pick, D.D., an excellent authority, who writes as follows: "The Greek language employs for both the 'Holy Ghost' and 'Holy Spirit' the same word or rather the same two words. Ghost is an old English word of Saxon origin (German (geist), equivalent to soul or spirit, and occurs as the translation of the Hebrew nephesh and the Greek pneuma, both signifying 'breath,' 'life,' 'spirit,' or 'living principle,' by which and similar terms they are elsewhere rendered (Job 11: 20; Jer. 15: 9; Matt. 27: 50; John 19: 30). It frequently occurs in the New Testament in the sacred name 'Holy Ghost.' In the Authorized (King James') Version, the term 'Holy Ghost' is retained, so also in the Douai Version. In the Revised Version, the same term is also found, but with the marginal note, 'Holy Spirit.' The version published by the American Baptist Publication Society uses everywhere the term 'Holy Spirit.'"

E. J. C., Portland, Ark. When and by whom was the Book of Daniel written?

Daniel is supposed to have lived about 600 B.C. While there has been much discussion regarding the book which bears his name, and especially as to the interpretation of his prophecies, there is little reason to doubt that, as the book itself testifies, Daniel was the author. Chapter 7, verses 1 to 28, chapter 8: 2, and chapter 9: 2, all give evidence of personal authorship. The language of the book is partly Chaldee and partly Hebrew. Its contents have given rise to more discussion than any other prophetic book in the Bible.

L. S., Grand River, S. D. For the benefit of our Sunday School, please answer the following questions: 1. Could Christ sin? 2. What is the meaning of I. Peter 3: 19, 20?

1. No. He was the Perfect One, of unblemished purity (Heb. 7: 26, 28). Sinless (John 8: 46; II. Cor. 5: 21). He needed no sacrifice for himself (Heb. 4: 15 and 7: 27, and I. John 3: 5). He is holy (Luke 1: 35; Acts 4: 27; Rev. 3: 7). Righteous (Isa. 53: 11; Heb. 1: 9). Spotless (I. Pet. 1: 19). Innocent (Matt. 27: 4). Able to overcome all temptation (Matt. 4: 1-10). He was sinless, yet he bore the sins of many; and though in taking upon himself the form of humanity, and being in all things as we are, yet he was without sin. 2. Your second question has been treated in THE MAIL-BAG recently.

F. L. G., Ivy Mills, Pa. 1. Can you tell me the names of the two men who hung on crosses beside Christ? 2. Also the names of the three men who went to see Jesus when he was just born and took presents to him.

1. All we know concerning their names is what has been preserved by traditions. One of these calls the two crucified thieves Demas (or Dismas) and Gestas, the former being the penitent. Another variation calls them Titus and Dimachus. Bede gives them in his Collecton as Maltha and Joca. It is not possible now to decide whether any of these be accurate. 2. Bede is authority for the names of the Magi, which he gives as Caspar, Melchior and Balthasar.

R. M., Dubuque, Ia. The proposed union of churches under a common creed has some advocates here, but there are many who regard it as impracticable. How is it viewed by Protestant churches generally?

Observation leads to the conclusion that the principal agitators for a "creedless church" are to be found outside of the church organizations. Churches can unite for many kinds of Christian work without dropping their distinctive denominational characteristics. The dream of a common creed cannot be realized so long as the prevailing creeds hold large bodies of people loyally together, as now, and while there are as many different kinds of humanity, intellectually and spiritually, as there are different flowers in the field or colors in the rainbow. God's work admits of many varieties of service and all service that is of the heart is acceptable. The

By NICHOLAS SOYER

Chef of Brooks' Club, London

The Method—A Revolution in Cooking

THE METHOD of cooking well-nigh everything but soups in paper bags, on a broiler, in any and every kind of oven, is clearly and fully explained in this book by M. Soyer, the famous chef of Brooks' Club, London, the originator and perfector of this system, which bids fair to revolutionize cooking the world over. The American edition has been revised by Marion Harland's daughter, Mrs. Virginia Terhune Van de Water, the American equivalents taking the place of English culinary terms.

A Proved Success

In England the method at once had an immense vogue. Within less than a month 60,000 copies of M. Soyer's book were sold, and the supply of paper bags, owing to the immediate and unlooked-for demand, became exhausted. All classes interested themselves in the matter—epicures, cooks and food-reformers, members of Parliament, heads of colleges, social workers, sportsmen, and the public in general. All over England the method has been tested, and has proved a triumphant success. Already it has had the endorsement of epicures, of experts in cookery, and of the leading chefs of London.

Advantages of the Soyer Method

The advantages of the method—there are no disadvantages—make it a boon alike to rich and poor, to those who cook themselves and those who enjoy the cooking of others, and for these reasons:

1. It makes every dish more savory and nutritious.
2. It is economical: the food weighing practically the same when drawn from, as when put into, the oven.
3. It is labor-saving—no cleaning of pots or pans.
4. It is hygienic—no germ-haunted cooking utensils.
5. No smell of cooking—the bag is sealed with a clip.

It is clear that, where paper-bag cookery is adopted, the kitchen—especially the humble kitchen—will become a new room, for, greasy pots and pans virtually dispensed with, the atmosphere will be changed. The activity of the microbe will also be hindered. Labor will be saved, and quicker cooking will lower the coal and gas bill. For dwellers in small flats and single rooms—for bachelors and bachelor maids, clerks, typists, and school-teachers—the advantages are obvious, and not the least of these is freedom from the odor of cooking.

The Recipes, etc.

Under the heads Fish, Entrees, Poultry, Vegetables, Savories, Sweets, Cooking of Cold Meats (Rechauffes), Breakfast Dishes, The Bag and the Bachelor (recipes for bachelors and bachelor maids), and A Week's Dinner for the Working Man, M. Soyer, a famous cook, brings together his own choice and tested recipes, all of which can be perfectly cooked by the paper-bag method. At the end of the volume is a paper on paper-bag cookery from the epicurean standpoint by the well-known authority in culinary matters, Mr. George R. Sims, and a paper from the hygienic standpoint by Dr. Charles Reinhardt.

Marion Harland writes in a recent article:

If my readers are as curious concerning the odd process as I was when I began the perusal of literature relating to it, they will bear with a last and longer quotation. A competent cook of the middle class was persuaded to attempt a simple dinner of salmon cutlets, a roast of lamb, with potatoes and asparagus.

"She didn't believe in these newfangled ideas," she said, quite simply; but there was a world of meaning in the way she said it.

The initial difficulty was to make her comprehend that nothing need accompany the salmon in the bag—neither water nor butter. She expressed a pious hope, but not confidently, that the fish would not be burned to a cinder. And only by the greatest self-restraint was she able to avoid flouring the lamb before putting the meat into the bag.

"What is to brown it and where is the gravy to come from?" she inquired, reasonably enough. The methods of cooking asparagus and potatoes suggested, perhaps, the greatest revolution in her preconceived ideas of cookery. To begin with, putting water into a paper bag seemed a mad notion.

"And when it begins to boil (if it ever does boil!) it will bust," she said with conviction.

The narrator takes up the tale, with the sequel:

"The salmon was perfectly done—the sweetest I ever tasted. It stuck a little to the paper, and perhaps a little butter would be an improvement. The lamb came out of the oven, after three-quarters of an hour, a beautiful golden color, with plenty of gravy in the bag—very thick gravy, to which water might be added without diluting it much below lamb-proof strength. The potatoes were also perfectly cooked."

U. S. Consul-General John L. Griffiths, London, reports in the "Daily Consular Reports":

Demonstrations of paper-bag cooking have been given in London for some time, and are still attracting considerable attention.

The proprietor of one of the largest restaurants in London, in speaking of the use of the paper bag in cooking, says that it is a preventive of the congregation of microbes. In many homes the dishes and pans lie about for hours without being cleaned. The result is that microbes are drawn to the grease and not so easily exterminated. Under the new system cleanliness is assured. The microbe has no resting place. The clean bag is at hand. When done with it can be thrown into the fire. It secures a clean kitchen for the homes of the people. Moreover, the nutritive properties are maintained, while there is no waste.

A considerable saving is effected through the use of the paper bag. All roasted meats cooked in the ordinary way lose, it is stated, about four ounces of each pound. There is also a loss when meats are boiled, and a perceptible though smaller loss when they are braised. In paper-bag cookery the broad claim is put forth that there is practically no loss. The saving in fuel, whether coal, gas, or electricity is used, amounts, according to the estimates of the advocates of paper-bag cookery, to at least 40 per cent., for the reason that much less time is required to cook the food than in the old way."

A Corner of the Mission Reading Room

THE BOWERY MISSION'S WINTER WORK

By J. G. HALLIMOND, Superintendent

ON TUESDAY, November 7, the Bowery Mission will celebrate its thirty-second anniversary. On that occasion, seated side by side on the platform will be the two saintly women whose names have been closely associated with, and whose affections have been so deeply centred in, the work of the Mission—Fanny Crosby and "Mother" Ward.

The blind poetess was one of the earliest supporters of the Mission. She regularly attended the anniversary gatherings, and generally contributed an appropriate poem. Some of her most moving hymns were written under the inspiration she received whilst engaged in "rescuing the perishing" in the Bowery. Now, in her beautiful old age, she often sends messages of cheer and hope, and never fails to show her continued interest in what she calls her Mission.

This coming anniversary event will launch the Mission in its winter work, which promises to be an exceedingly busy one. Never has there been a more fruitful year in the history of the Mission. The nightly meetings are always crowded to the doors. Should any man be obliged to leave the room, his place is instantly taken by some patient waiter on the threshold. During the intense heat of the recent summer, when to speak of an indoor meeting generally produced an almost stifling effect, no difference whatever occurred either in the crowds or the results.

The regular leaders and associate leaders of the Mission, a body of twenty-two men in all, are always at their posts, and untiring in their efforts to maintain the efficiency of the meetings. The visitors' book contains the names of people who have come to see the Mission from every quarter of the globe, and without exception, after attending the services, they express themselves as being impressed and delighted with what they see and hear.

A Platform View of the Bowery Mission Leaders Beginning a Gospel Service

Probably the chief instrumentality in reaching such a position of efficiency has been the Brotherhood. This was inaugurated on June 30, 1907, and since that time some 12,000 men have been enrolled. A very large proportion of these men have given evidence of being soundly converted, and not one of them has left the circle without the possession at any rate of a strong moral stimulus in his life. No one can estimate the far-reaching effects of a record like this.

At the conclusion of each evening's meeting a card is given to the men who profess to be under some degree of religious impression, which reads as follows: "This card is given you on your public declaration that it is your desire and determination to live an upright life. Keep this portion by you as a reminder of this serious act of yours. God has promised to help you. Seek by prayer and faith his continual aid and you will succeed. Come to the Brotherhood meeting to-morrow evening at seven o'clock. Present the other portion of this card to Mr. Balevre, the leader, who will give you a kind and hearty welcome."

The counterpart of the card reads:

"I, ————————, ask that my name be enrolled as a member of the Bowery Mission Brotherhood, and I promise by God's help to live a good, true, and upright life. Date. Signature."

The first of these cards was given out on October 3, 1910. The record for twelve months of cards given out, and cards returned, is:

	Given Out	Returned Signed
October,	1,178	363
November,	1,468	477
December,	524	194
January,	330	151
February,	367	145
March,	428	177
April,	768	197
May,	687	172
June,	1,057	210
July,	990	176
August,	966	195
Sept'ber,	1,036	245
October,	164	42
Total,	9,965	2,744

It is in the Brotherhood Circle that the real work of character-building commences. The great change which we call conversion may have taken place in the large public meeting, or elsewhere; but it is here that the soul's real needs and difficulties are discovered and met.

Then comes the work of the Free Labor Bureau. No one can visit the Mission meetings without being impressed with the fact that the one great crying need is employment. The casual observer sees in the crowd scores of able-bodied, eager, intelligent-looking men who ought to be at work. We know these men more intimately and are quite convinced that nine out of ten would work if they had the chance, and our Labor Bureau records prove that when the chance is given the vast majority make good. Recent reports from charity organizations and labor unions undeniably establish the fact that the great curse of poverty, which, alas, in this wealthy country is darkening the lives of from ten to twelve millions of

CONVICTION OF SIN

TEXT: Rom. 3:10—"There is none righteous, no, not one."

The sixteenth of a series of remarkable sermons by Moody, never before published, the existence of which was disclosed only a few months ago. The absolute authenticity of the sermons is vouched for by the evangelist's son, Wm. R. Moody, who cordially approves their publication in this paper. The sermons are the exclusive property of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

TO-DAY we are to talk about how to help those who are not yet convinced of sin. There's no use in telling a man that Jesus Christ came to save him, if he doesn't know that he is lost, or in telling a man of a remedy if he hasn't got a wound that needs a remedy. If I should send a doctor to a well man, the doctor would be insulted, and so would the man; but if there is a poor and needy sick man, and I send a doctor with medicine, the man will be thankful. Therefore, a man must feel his need before he wants a Saviour. I believe if we are in the Spirit, and are willing to use the power for that one's help, it will be a help. We are to sow on all kinds of soil and to scatter the seed everywhere. A man may be perfectly indifferent today, and inside of twenty-four hours the Spirit of God may act on him and convict him of sin. But our work is to give him the Word of God, and let God speak through the Scripture.

Dwight L. Moody

Four Words

Now, if you will take four words—four different passages of Scripture—you will find Christ's method in dealing with the self-righteous of his day. For instance: "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." That was said to a man who thought he was in the kingdom of God; it was said to an honorable member of the Sanhedrin. In another place he says, "Except your righteousness exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of God." That was said to the self-righteous of Christ's day. Again, "Except ye become as a little child, ye cannot see the kingdom." That was said to the self-righteous. Again: "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." It's a good thing to give them the Word of God. I am not responsible for their conviction. I cannot convict them; but I can give them the Word of God, and look to the Spirit to breathe upon it and to breathe life into the soul.

Another portion is the third chapter of Romans, tenth verse: "As it is written, there is none righteous, no, not one." That is, we must be given righteousness that we may stand before the righteous God. A perfect God could give nothing but a perfect standard of grace, and if we are to stand before God, we must be perfect. How? Not in our own righteousness surely; but he has worked out a righteousness, and in him we are complete. Eleventh verse: "There is none that understandeth, that seeketh after God." That is, the natural man doesn't seek after God until he has been quickened with the Spirit. "There is none that doeth good; no, not one." If a man does a good deed and he is proud of it, or does it from a selfish motive, it is not righteous in the sight of God.

The Mirror of the Law

Now, the 19th verse: "We know that whatsoever things the law saith, . . . all the world may become guilty before God." The law never saved a man who is vile—it never can. What was it given for? It was given to show man his need of a Saviour. In other words, to stop every man's mouth; and that's what God does before he saves a man.

No one can help a man out of his sins who is filled with his own self-righteousness. That's what has taken him down. He thinks that he can assert his manhood without God, but when he gets to the end of himself—like the prodigal, "comes to himself," and cries to God, and God gives him victory—he snaps the fetters that held him. Mark you, the man must see that he is vile before he wants to be cleansed.

When my little boy was about two or three years old, a little while before the Chicago fire, I said to him one morning at breakfast, "I'll come home and take you out to ride." It was a Saturday, and I always, when at home, gave my children a ride. My little son clapped his hands, and said, "Will you take me down to the park and show me the bears?" "Yes." And he began to tease his mother to get him ready. And she did. She washed him, and got him ready with his white dress and sash; and then he wanted to go out-doors and watch for my coming. He had a strange passion in those days for sticking his finger in the dirt and putting it in his mouth. And when I had driven up, he came out, and said, "Take me down and show me the bears. I's clean! I's clean. Mama washed me." I said, "You are not clean. No, you are all dirty." I could not convince him he was not all right. I'll tell you what I did. I hitched the horse and I took the boy and showed him his own face in the mirror, and he never said he was "clean" after that. I didn't take the looking glass to wash his face. But I took him to the water, and washed him. It's easy for a man to think himself pretty good—a good deal better than other people. It's an awful disease, this disease of self-righteousness. It's a family disease; it's a bad disease, because it's loathsome and hateful in the sight of God.

Now, you take the elder brother in the 15th of Luke, and I don't hesitate to say he's one of the meanest characters in history. I'll tell you why. A lady came to me some time ago who wanted to get her daughter into a seminary, and she wanted it to be "very select." She said she wouldn't get anything "under false pretenses." She said, "I want you to understand that I don't agree with your theology." I didn't know that I had any "theology." I said, "Will you tell me what your theology is? What is it you don't like?" "Oh," she said, "your view of the elder brother in the 15th of Luke is abominable." I said, "Will you bring out his noble traits?" "He stayed at home and took care of his father, and his younger brother ran off and left him." "The last time I saw him he was visiting the house and wouldn't go in. And I believe he is outside yet. Now," I said, "my good woman, I want to tell you something. If you find a man who cannot rejoice over the return of a brother, pray God to have mercy on him. If I thought I had a drop of that blood in my veins, I'd let it out before night, if it were only a teaspoonful."

The Principles of the Kingdom

Christ laid down the principles of his kingdom. When the King takes the throne, he makes an address. So Christ laid down the principles of his kingdom. "Blessed are they that mourn." Mourn for what? "Never done anything to mourn for; never done anything wrong," you say. Did any of you ever endeavor to live in a house with a person who had never done wrong? If you have, I tell you I pity you deep down in my heart. Why? If anything goes wrong, he always insists that you are to blame. He isn't. He couldn't do it. Have you ever met those men? I have met them, and they are the meanest men to get on with that I've ever met.

Now, this man had never transgressed his father's will. Wasn't he angelic? Wasn't he a noble character? I've heard of a man who thought so much of himself that he shook hands with himself every morning. That's the elder brother. He's the noblest man in the world. "Blessed are the poor in spirit." He was so full of his self-righteousness that if he ever tumbled he would have gone over backwards. Some people say that when Adam sinned he fell upwards. Men are living who wouldn't love a drunken brother. "Don't mention that brother in my presence!" they say; "I am ashamed that he bears the same name I do." "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness." Did the elder brother know what that means? No, not a bit of it. He had plenty of righteousness, tons of it, lots of it to spare; but I wouldn't give a penny for ten tons of that kind of righteousness; I don't want that kind. "Blessed are the peacemakers." He was a wonderful peacemaker; he broke up the most peaceful scene this world ever saw. That father's heart danced for joy, and that elder brother broke up that jubilation and was mad because the father was rejoicing over the return of his wandering son. "Blessed are the merciful." Was he merciful to the old father in his declining years, putting the thorns in his pillow and making his last days bitter? "Blessed are the poor in heart." Was he so, when he said his father had never given him a kid to make merry with his friends? He had everything, and was angry b cause his father had killed the fatted calf. Do y tell me that elder brother didn't need to be co verted? Heaven is a "prepared place for a pr pared people." Was that man meet for heave Take him up to the streets of heaven, and put hi under the very shadow of the tree of life, and wouldn't want to stay there. Why? Because the are in heaven men who once were drunkards, a he wouldn't want to associate with them. He'd sa "I never associated with this sort of people and won't now." That's the elder brother. I can ima ine some one seeing Mary Magdalene up there that woman who had seven devils in her—and sa ing, "I never associated with such people down the earth, and I won't here." What's the man g ing to do up there? He'd want to have a little ha of his own. That's the elder brother, so nobl Don't any man or woman tell me that he doesn need to be converted or born of the Spirit. That what the law was given for—to show a man h need—to put life alongside of Christ. Let hi measure himself with the law of God.

"All Have Gone Astray"

The fifty-third chapter of Isaiah says: "All v like sheep have gone astray; we have turned eve one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on hi the iniquity of us all." That's the Gospel, n friends. I don't know any other Gospel. We' got sinners divided up into classes; some are so lo and depraved that they can never be saved; ar some so weak that they can't stand; but it says tha Jesus Christ can put strength into the weake mortal; and not only that, but can save him an keep him.

Years ago, in the Hippodrome, New York, a poo miserable fellow came in and godly women talke with him. One of them showed how God could pu strength into him. We had in those days "scrip. We had ten-cent scrip. And this fellow had ten-cent scrip in his pocket, and as he went out o the meeting, he said, "Lord, if you'll save me, let m keep this ten-cent scrip for twenty-four hours." H said he hadn't been able for years to go past th whisky shop with a penny in his pocket. And h said the next day, as he brought out the ten-cen scrip, "I believe I've been converted. I've kept for twenty-four hours. I'm a new man in the ol clothes."

There was an old man, one of the weakest an lowest of drunkards. He was converted at th same time at the Hippodrome. Afterwards I got business card from him, from London, and God ha kept him all these many years. We want to go an tell these men that God can put strength into them The self-righteous man needs it; the forlorn ma needs it; the drunkard needs it. We are a "ba lot." All gone astray—every one.

First John, first chapter, eighth verse: "If w say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, an the truth is not in us." Tenth verse: "If we sa that we have not sinned, we make Him a liar, and hi word is not in us." Now, is there any one that ca say they haven't sinned? One man or woman in whole city that can say that? Do you believe it We have all sinned. What's to be done? Confess it Repent and ask forgiveness. That is all.

"Whosoever Will"

Now I come to another class—those that are heart wounded. The law has done its work. Instead o talking to them about sin, bring them to Calvary Give them Matt. 11: 29: "Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, and ye shall find rest to your souls. John 5: 24: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he tha heareth my word and believeth in him that sent me hath everlasting life, and shall not come into con demnation; but is passed from death unto life." John 1: 11: "He came unto his own, and his own received him not. But as many as received him, t them he gave power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name."

O my friends, what we want is to get a man born of God, and then he gets life coming down from God "who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree." O Heavenly Father, we now want t ask that thou wilt make us wise in winning souls t thee. And while people are inquiring and are on the right road, and on the way to the Kingdom, may we be ready to point the way and tell them the way and truth. We pray that thy blessings may rest on us. May the Spirit of God teach us. May the fetters of sin be broken, and may sinners come into the kingdom. All these things we ask in the name and for the sake of Jesus Christ. Amen.

MY GARDEN

Will you come with me to the past may-be,
And I'll lead you through the gate,
A fragrance there of a garden fair,
Where small ghost-shadows wait.
There are wraiths of things like white moth wings
That the flowers can never fade.
Will you come with me to the past may-be
To that garden where I played?

There are columbines and trumpet vines
A-climbing o'er the wall,
And the hollyhocks and the nodding phlox
All standing straight and tall.
There's a drowsy hum when the wild bees come
To the apple blossoms' shade.
And the flowers and things, and the clover rings,
In that garden where I played!

Will you climb with me in the apple tree
While the blossoms fall about,
Drift the air with the sunbeams there,
And the whole wide world without?
While the sky is blue as the larkspur's hue,
And my heart is unafraid:
Will you swing with me 'neath the apple tree
In that garden where I played?

Won from Materialism

ONE of the most noted masters of science to abandon the Darwinian theory of evolution, writes Rev. A. B. Hyson, is Professor Alfred Russel Wallace, LL.D., F.R.S., the contemporary and co-laborer of Charles Darwin in the formation, fifty years ago, of the theory of man's evolution from the lowest forms of nature. Ten years ago Professor Wallace wrote a book defending radical evolution. Within the last year he has had the honesty and courage to appear in print and retract his stand of many years on this subject. In opposition to the materialistic view of creation, Professor Wallace says, "I cannot comprehend how any just and unprejudiced mind . . . can persuade itself to believe that the whole thing is the blind and unintelligent accident. In the minutest cells, in the blood, in the whole earth and throughout the stellar universe . . . there is intelligent and conscious direction; in a word, there is Mind." In the following paragraph the great scientist acknowledges that this is the mind of the Ultimate God." Professor Wallace declares that "materialism is fatal for all intelligent minds," and that men will soon be brought to see that "materialism is the most gigantic foolishness." Dr. Wallace continues: "I believe there is a purpose in creation. It meets me everywhere I turn. I cannot examine the smallest or the commonest living thing without finding my reason uplifted and amazed by the miracle, by the beauty, by the power and the wisdom of its creation." Even more remarkable and rare are Professor Wallace's statements concerning the evolutionary theory of man's origin. He writes: "Nothing in evolution can account for the soul of man. The difference between man and the other animals is unbridgeable."

Big Tasks and Little Tasks

By EUGENE THWING

EVERY one of us who is good for anything is confronted by some task that is too big for his powers; but how different is the spirit with which one man and another may be seen, at times, to approach such work! The first sees only the bigness of the task and the littleness of his own power. Doubt and discouragement tug at his heart. He sees no hope of success. Defeat crushes him before he begins. The other man looks at the bigness of the undertaking and thrills with pride and eagerness in the knowledge that it is appointed to him to do a giant's work. He hears a challenge to his sturdy manhood, and all that is in him of power and determination responds to the call. Is he too little and weak now? Very well, he will make himself greater and stronger. Never mind the bigness of the task; he will tackle it at a single point first. By to-morrow, or the next day, he will have grown, and can take a firmer hold. Soon he will be bigger than his task; he will master it; it will be conquered and behind him, and he will be ready and eager for even greater work.

The world would stand still in ignorance and savagery if men were not constantly grappling with tasks far too big for their present powers. In every assault upon disease, in every battle for political or religious liberty, in every search for the hidden mysteries of science, men have been baffled again and again. The enormous tasks of the world's civilization and regeneration have presented frowning and seemingly impregnable fronts, but, behind, the glory light has shone, and man has rushed the more eagerly to the attack after every repulse. The blessing withheld is worth fighting for, and, like Jacob wrestling with the angel till break of day, even when his thigh was out of joint, man has always wrestled with tasks too big for him, and has exclaimed, "I will not let go until I prevail and win the blessing."

MAN himself, at best, is weak and could never accomplish a very large task with his own power alone. He must find out and ally himself with the great external forces of nature and of God. The young man who sits at his little instrument in the ship's cabin and silently summons help from other ships and the shore hundreds of miles away is a giant of power, while the strongest seaman with the mightiest voice shouting through his hands out into the storm is a helpless pygmy before his task.

"Learn how" is the motto for every man, woman, and child who has a task too big for single-handed power. Find out the force outside of self that may be summoned to be your obedient slave, as Aladdin summoned the genii to do his bidding. Every great invention has been the result of some man's search to find the right way to do a task that was too big for him before. It was too great a task to cross this wide continent on foot, so man summoned steam to drive his engines and haul his trains a mile a minute and annihilate the distance. As the population increased and spread over vast areas, and business demanded quick and constant intercourse, it was altogether too big a task to hold communication man with man. Morse grappled with the mighty problem and gave the world the telegraph. Still the task of communication was too big for ships at sea, until Marconi wrested more secrets from the very heavens and revealed the wonders of wireless telegraphy.

MAN grows rapidly through his struggles and his victories. "Canst thou harness the lightning?" asked Jehovah of his servant Job three thousand years ago. The patriarch of Uz trembled at the thought as he saw the wild fire flashing through the heavens, and in awe he answered no. But years afterward Benjamin Franklin caught and bridled the lightning, Morse harnessed it, and Edison drives it whither he will. So docile and obedient has this mighty force been rendered by the men who found out how, that the children in our homes by turning a little button with two fingers daily perform tasks far beyond the power of the strongest, wisest men a few short years ago.

OBEDIENCE to the natural laws of the world and co-operation with them is the one secret, the one necessary condition of success in the doing of any work. Obey the great forces of nature and they will do your bidding. Disobey them and they will crush you utterly. Obey the lightning and it will send your messages, light your cities, operate your machinery. Disobey it and, in an instant, it will strike you dead. Obey fire and it will do your cooking and warm your houses in the bitterest winter. Disobey it and it will sweep your city from the face of the earth. Obey the fixed laws of business and you can build up a successful enterprise. Disobey them and commercial failure will overtake you.

Even in the physical labor of the individual there are laws as to the proper expenditure or conservation of energy which, if obeyed, make labor far easier and less exhausting. Every employee working for wages can, by careful searching, find out the laws affecting his relation to his work and to his employer, and his obedience of these laws will mean his advancement, while defiance or neglect of them will mean just as truly his retrogression and hardships. In the work of the home, the wise housewife who takes the trouble to study and obey the many little laws of domestic economy, labor saving, and conservation of her own and her helpers' time and physical strength finds that friction is removed, backaches and heartaches avoided, and the home made a pleasanter place for herself and all who come into it.

MORE than all else, alliance with God himself, obedience of his laws, coming into personal harmony with the great spiritual forces will equip any man or woman for the task that is too big for human power. The noblest as well as the mightiest station in life is to be a "laborer together with God." No work of blessing or regeneration in the world is too great for the co-partnership of man and God. Doubt and discouragement have no place in the heart of any human member of such a firm.

Have you a task too big for you? Thank God that you are not so little thought of that you must be condemned to do some little task alone. Thank God, with joy and eagerness in your heart, that he has appointed to you a task which will lift you up to higher powers, which will ennoble your life, which gives you the right to call upon him as your partner, and that henceforth it will be you and God in the struggle and in the victory.

THE PASSING OF SUMMER

"SUMMER is dead." It was the wind that spake
In the bronze mantle of the sombre pine—
"The sumach bush unfurls a scarlet sign,
The sere rush signals it in stream and lake,
Soundeth a requiem in gilded brake,
Where mateless birds a lonely fate repine,
The sky is veiled in tears, each gray confine Bespeaks the shrunken branch the leaves forsake.

"I laugh with ruddy Autumn in the morn,
I sound his praises in the golden light.
But when high noon has passed and raven night
Comes rushing down, I wail with those forlorn:
The dying leaves, the lone flowers, pale and torn,
The multitudes confronting death or flight.

Putting the Men to Work

CHURCH fairs were an old story in a thriving little village. So much so that housewives declared they had all the unnecessary trifles their homes could harbor. Yet the church needed money and something must be done. Some one suggested an oyster supper; but other members recalled that the last one was not a great success, and the men had declared the women to be poor cooks. The matter was under discussion one evening, when one very little woman suggested that the men in the congregation get up an oyster supper to suit themselves, and the women would be the patrons. It turned out to be such a startling success that the church found itself richer by nearly $200 in the end.

The men did give the supper—they cooked it and they served it in the basement of the church, the women not even so much as setting the table. Oysters were served in several ways, after which came "good coffee, like mother used to make"—and mince pie! The pie tasted very much as if some woman's hand had mixed the pastry; but the men refused to tell where it came from, and the women did not question. Those who waited on the tables wore large, white butcher aprons, and the women guests were required to "tip" the waiters, else they received very poor service. The affair turned out to be the greatest possible success, and the food was really good, for the men as a rule proved excellent cooks. J. L.

THE SONG OF THE LEAVES

THE dead leaves sighed to the passing wind:
"Carry us!
Far, far from here on thy mighty wings,
Away to realms of forgotten things,
Where the unwept dead a grave may find,
Carry us!"

The dead leaves sighed to the flying dust:
"Cover us!
That the airy butterflies overhead
May see us not, unlovely and dead,
Hide us from sight, for decay we must.
Cover us!"

The dead leaves sighed to the chilling rain:
"Weep for us!
For we shall blend with the roadside slime,
And they who saw us in Summer's prime,
Shall, passing by, know us not again.
Weep for us!"

The dead leaves sighed to the falling snow:
"Bury us!
Bury us deep in untrodden ways;
Far from the glory of bygone days,
Far from the summer of long ago,
Bury us!"

So the keen wind blew them far away;
The dust enwrapped them in clouds of gray;
The rain wept over their early doom;
And the white snow silently built their tomb.

The World's Methodism in Toronto

THE greatest denominational gathering, if not the largest religious meeting, ever held in Canada is doubtless the Fourth Ecumenical Methodist Conference, which met in Toronto, Canada, from October 4 to 17. Canadian Methodism, having her origin from both English and American sources, naturally cherishes a spirit of cordiality toward the Methodism of both countries. The city of Toronto has no less than forty-two Methodist churches, and of her 400,000 population probably one quarter hold allegiance to the church of John Wesley.

The Ecumenical Conference, as the name implies, is representative of world-wide Methodism. The Conference is divided into two sections: the Western, including the various branches of the church in the United States both North and South and in Canada (with their interests in foreign lands) and the Methodist Church of Japan; the Eastern section, comprising the several branches in Great Britain, Continental Europe, Africa, and Australia. There were elected 500 delegates, including many ministers and laymen whose names are familiar wherever the English language is spoken. Among the distinguished laymen from the United States were Mr. John R. Mott, general secretary World's Student Christian Federation; Hon. J. Frank Hanly, former governor of Indiana; Hon. R. F. Vessey, governor of North Dakota; Lieutenant-Governor A. J. Wallace of California; and Senator Joseph L. Bristow of Kansas. No less than forty bishops represented the dignity of the Church on this side of the Atlantic, with innumerable well-known editors, publishers, chaplains, college presidents and professors, presidents and secretaries of denominational societies, and Sunday School superintendents of international renown. Canada included two members of Parliament and two King's Councilors among the twenty-four members constituting the Canadian contingent. The Eastern section catalogued the names of noted divines, members of the Parliament and the Cabinet, aldermen, councilors, physicians, and millionaire merchants and manufacturers. One beautiful characteristic of the Conference was the interest shown by the delegate from one section in the work of his brother delegate from some other part of the world.

Toronto manifested her hospitality in many ways. All delegates from over the seas were entertained in Methodist homes. Delegates from the United States were regarded in the light of hosts, yet many of them also were invited to be guests of individuals. A graceful compliment on the part of the city authorities was the civic reception tendered to Conference delegates by His Worship Mayor G. R. Geary, the Board of Control, and the City Council, in the City Hall. Fully one thousand persons attended. Mayor Geary and his mother, who is the daughter of a Methodist minister, shook hands with the visitors as they passed through his office. An orchestra and tables of refreshments gave a festive air to the building. This courtesy was followed later in the session by a garden party at the Government House by His Honor the Lieutenant Governor and Mrs. Gibson, assisted by the premier of the Province, Sir James Whitney. A luncheon was given in honor of the women delegates, by a committee representing the various women's organizations of Toronto. Several of the British delegates were entertained by the British Welcome League, and on the two Sundays of the Conference all the Methodist pulpits of the city were occupied by delegates, each of the two sections furnishing an equal number of preachers. A special convocation of Victoria University, one of the leading Methodist educational institutions in Canada, was an unexpected event of interest. Honorary degrees were conferred upon several representative members. Even the street railways contributed to the spirit of hospitality by furnishing badges which gave to delegates and their families free transportation over their lines.

The regular meetings of the Conference were held in Metropolitan Church, a beautiful edifice seating 2,200 persons, and boasting one of the finest organs on this continent. This church has been prominently associated with Canadian Methodism for nearly forty years. In the upper part of the church was arranged a museum of Methodist antiquities, historic documents, and objects of special interest. In another room was a picture gallery filled with portraits of missionary worthies and exhibit illustrating various means and methods of missionary work. Meetings of social nature were held in Massey Hall; most notable of these was the banquet given on Friday evening, October 13, which was one of the most brilliant affairs of its kind ever given in the city. The seats of the great auditorium were removed to make room for the tables, the first gallery was reserved for visitors and the hosts of the delegates, while the upper gallery was used by the general Methodist public. One hundred young women from Methodist homes acted as waitresses.

However much this account of festivities and interchange of amenities may sound like the description of a social gathering, any visitor nurturing such thought must have been speedily disillusioned by the words of the Rev. Henry Haigh of Newcastle-on-Tyne, England, President of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, in his response to the welcome extended at the first business session. "A great Conference like this gathered from the ends of the earth should not meet and do nothing. It is delightful to picnic, but we have something greater than a picnic; and I hope there will be frank talk that shall be followed by great deeds in the days to come."

The veteran of Canadian Methodism, Rev. Dr. Albert Carman, General Superintendent of the Methodist Church in Canada since 1884, presided at the opening session. In the course of his words of salutation and welcome, Dr. Carman said: "It were worse than folly for us to come together from the ends of the earth merely for our own pleasure or self-exaltation, or to devote our energies in any degree to speculation or unpractical and unprofitable questions when there are so many tremendously important issues at hand."

The keynote of the Conference was struck by the [illegible] Henry Haigh. Having spent twenty-seven strenuous years as a missionary in India, where he revised and edited translations of the New Testament and commentaries, and edited the Harvest Field, this most versatile of men is now acting as administrator and evangelist preacher. In the course of his inaugural sermon of the Conference taken from the text, "The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few," Mr. Haigh said: "My brethren, I think it is time that the leaders of Methodism should begin to recognize, as perhaps they have never done before, that in the signs of these times there is the promise of a harvest."

Never was the note of urgency more definitely struck in Methodism than when at the close of the sermon people from the four quarters of the globe gathered around the rail to partake of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. This was administered by Bishop J. M. Walden, of Cincinnati, Senior Bishop Methodist Episcopal Church; Bishop Matthew W. Wilson, of Baltimore, Senior Bishop Methodist Episcopal Church, South; Rev. Edwin Dalton, of Hull, England, President Primitive Methodist Church.

The Ecumenical Conferences have no legislative or administrative functions; they are deliberative bodies meeting to discuss topics of evangelical, ethical, and sociological value. They make no laws nor creeds, neither do they exist merely to exploit Methodism. They do, however, meet with the purpose of promoting a spirit of universal brotherhood with the hope for greater inspiration that shall lead to greater triumphs; and to consider their common perplexing problems. Not only does Methodism receive a great impulse from such Conferences, but the beneficent effects are widely felt outside denominational limits. A pleasing feature of one session was the reception of fraternal delegates representing the Baptist World Alliance, International Congregational Council, and Presbyterian Alliance. The presiding officer upon this occasion was the Hon. Justice J. J. MacLaren, the eminent Canadian jurist and one of the most prominent laymen in the Dominion; he is also president of the International Sunday School Association and one of the three life-members of the International Sunday School Lesson Committee.

A number of very live questions engaged the attention of the Conference. The members appeared unquestionably to realize that they were facing great problems and that they were vitally concerned as to their righteous solution. The Church's failures and weaknesses were discussed quite as frankly as her victories and triumphs. It was a time of stock-taking, and the progress of Methodism in the world in the last ten years was reviewed. There was a call for a great spiritual awakening, a returning to the principles of Methodism with an application to new conditions.

Among the first topics of discussion came the Immigration Problem of the Western World, which was shown to be of even greater import to the Canadian than to the citizen of the United States. Dr. S. D. Chown, of Winnipeg, Manitoba, pointed out that "while in the United States foreign-speaking immigration means an addition of about one per cent. annually to the population of the Republic, Canada's foreign-speaking immigration means an addition of about two per cent. every year to her population."

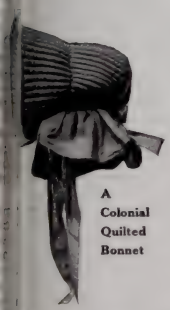
America's Treasure-House of Art



"The Maine Coast," Painted by Winslow Homer

"The Mill," Painted by Emile van Marcke

THE Metropolitan Museum of Art in New York City is at present the greatest treasure-house of the Western world, containing such vast and varied collections of works of art as to make it comparable to any of the best museums of Europe. Sir Caspar Purdon Clarke, the late executive head of the museum, who for many years was the curator of the South Kensington Museum in London, declared it was the fourth national museum in importance in the world; the other three being the Hermitage in St. Petersburg, the Louvre in Paris and the Great National Museum in London.

A Colonial Quilted Bonnet

One of the most delightful features of the great American treasure-house is its steady and insistent growth. Every season brings to its galleries new and important acquisitions, among the latest of which are the J. Pierpont Morgan collection of ancient glass. The collection ranks as the richest of its kind in the world. There are upwards of 8,000 pieces in one gallery alone, and one can almost trace the history of the world there. It is interesting to the point of astonishment not to pass casually from case to case and happen upon some small glass vase, catalogued "Hand made in Egypt 3,600 B.C.," or upon a string of glazed beads labeled "Roman, made by hand the year of our Lord 33," and a little farther on perhaps to come to an urn crudely made of blown glass, for holding the ashes of the dead, with a card informing one that the art of blowing glass was invented some time during the second century B.C., and somewhere in the Greek Orient.

Almost infinite varieties of mosaic, onyx, enamel and gilt glass plaques, vases, bottles, cups of most strange, beautiful and artistic workmanship spread out before one. Some have been found in Christian tombs and catacombs or buried in treasure vaults of civilizations long since vanished. One whole end of the gallery is given up to a display of large plates and bowls, flasks and barrels, jugs of extremely ancient date and splendidly painted with scenes of gladiatorial combats, with the names of the combatants inscribed beneath the picture. One stands fairly breathless before a group of tinted glass platters variously decorated with the Contest of Heracles, The Hunt of Adonis, Moses Striking Water from the Rock, The Three Men in the Fiery Furnace, The Children of Israel Crossing the Red Sea, all bearing such dates as to make one wonder not at all that there are those that have made glass the absorbing study of a lifetime.

Another wonderful and interesting collection recently bequeathed to the Metropolitan Museum of Art is a group of early American costumes, principally party gowns, such as were worn in colonial days, fifty years before the Declaration of Independence; and mantles, dresses and bonnets such as were worn during the administration of Presidents Adams and Jefferson in the early years of the nineteenth century. The charm and sweetness of these old-time frocks can hardly be described. It is like some sacred experience to happen upon a dainty bit of a satin party frock, embroidered in roses and lilies, a direct importation from France when Louis XV. was king and only so recently lifted out of its original box with the accompanying card of invitation, the fan, the lace mits, the slippers and the headdress, the kerchief and the tiny reticule, all suggesting so brilliantly the dainty quaintness of the maids and matrons who figured in American social life two hundred years ago. Caps of richly flowered brocade, quilted bonnets, cobweb laces and rare embroideries bespeak the skill of long forgotten needlewomen. The dresses are without exception so miniature, the gloves and the slippers so tiny, that though one is assured they were worn by the ladies of high degree one is tempted to believe they are the original costumes of the famous fashion dolls that were imported from France and copied by colonial milliners and mantua-makers for their fashionable patrons. Nor are silks and satins and rich brocades alone represented in this rare collection. Muslin dresses and dresses of prints and fancy calicos are here as well.

Still another recent gift to the Museum is a beautiful terra cotta Annunciation Angel of the Italian Renaissance. The youthful figure leaning slightly forward with raised hands crossed over her breast is so full of a compelling charm that it is most interesting to watch the fascination it has for the admiring crowds that surround it constantly. On the card at the base of the masterpiece we read, "Life size, from a group by Mato Civitale, 1436-1510, the most important sculptor of Lucca during the period of the Renaissance, whose work is classed with that of the great Florentine sculptors of the second half of the sixteenth century." A bronze bust of Tolstoy, the work of his son, Count Leo Tolstoy, by whom it was presented, is a recent gift expressly gratifying as an evidence of the interest which a foreigner of distinction takes in our American institution.

The most recent single painting presented to the Museum is a rarely beautiful Madonna by Geri Melchers. It is a picture of a young Dutch mother and a child, with a spirited figure of a kneeling girl who apparently clasps her hands to amuse the baby. The picture is radiant with sunlight and is brilliantly executed. "The Hermit," by Sargent, another recent acquisition, reveals a delight in the fantastic which is rarely shown in his work. Mrs. Russell Sage has recently bestowed a superb collection of Japanese ceramics and costly laces, and within the last three months splendid bestowals of furniture, armor, sculpture, ivories, musical instruments, and tapestries, gifts of enthusiastic patrons of the Museum, have found place in its beautiful halls.

A most important gift to the Museum this month is one of $100,000 from George A. Hearn, in memory of his son, Arthur Hoppock Hearn, and the

The Value of a Soul

WE ARE told in the Bible that there is rejoicing in heaven "over one sinner that repenteth," and that there is nothing of value in this world that a man will not give in exchange for his soul, to redeem it from destruction. Salvation is likened by the Saviour in parable to a "pearl of great price"—the price of a soul! The rich husbandman who had piled all his possessions in his barns and storehouses, would have gladly given them all to avert the doom which was to befall him that night, when his soul was to be required of him—to be ushered unrepentant and unready into judgment. If we take the Scriptural view, it is very clear that there is no human measure by which we may estimate the value of a soul. Its pricelessness is emphasized by Jesus in his teachings. All the golden dross of earth cannot outweigh it. This divine estimate is confirmed by all human experience. As we are brought face to face with death, we realize the worthlessness of the world's riches, which fly up in the scale when a single good deed outweighs them all!

Every human effort represents a money value. Churches cost so much to run, and religious work of every sort involves expenditures in proportion to its extent. Evangelism is not an exception, and one of the most sensational of this class of workers has lately computed, from his own experience, the comparative cost of winning a soul in different parts of the country. His tariff sheet gives a rate for different cities, running all the way from $100 up to $450. Just how he arrives at his figures is not easily explained. While it will be conceded that church finances should be a matter of accounting, we have yet to learn how any one can reduce the operations of the Holy Spirit to dollars and cents. A single soul saved may become in time a means of spiritual enlightenment to an entire community.

Who, then, can compute the value of even a single soul? From the point of view of any rightminded Christian, the whole suggestion of reckoning the money cost of soul-saving is a mercenary one in the last degree. It is putting God's work on the lowest possible plane. Men and women, ere now, have gladly given their lives to win souls. The whole history of home and missionary evangelism is red with the blood of martyrs. Nor can we forget the sublime valuation that is put upon the work of the soul-winner in the immortal words of Daniel: "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever."

It seems almost approaching sacrilege to estimate the value of a soul in mercantile terms. Stocks and bonds and buildings and jewels and lands—all these have their worldly value; but the souls of men are so precious that God's own Son died to save them. How, then, can we ticket them like articles of trade, when God himself holds them so dear? It is an unworthy and unprofitable discussion. Any pastor or evangelist who would drag down his holy calling to such a low level degrades his office and belittles the work of the Holy Spirit in the eyes of men. It should never be forgotten that ours is only the plowing and the sowing and the tillage, but the harvest is God's. He alone knows the heart. Our responsibility ends with our work and we should not even assume to claim the merit of soul-saving, since the assurance of acceptance must come from a higher Power.

A Royal Pedigree

THAT estimable citizen, Mr. John D. Rockefeller, who lately announced as his cardinal creed "Stick to your business," has gone out of his accustomed latitude to the extent of employing a genealogist to search out and formulate his family tree. We had always regarded Mr. Rockefeller as rather democratic in his tastes, although his immense wealth enables him to live among princely surroundings. It is a shrewd surmise that he personally cares very little for ancestry or the "claims of long descent"; but the thing has been done, and now he has a tree so imposing that it casts other trees into the shade. It would seem from this wonderful tree that our greatest American millionaire is lineally descended from a long line of English kings and nobles. There is, however, a slight defect, being an odd mixture of identities affecting an ancestor named Humphrey who is supposed to have come to this country early in the seventeenth century. The absence of a connecting link somewhat invalidates if it does not destroy much of the dignity of the ancestral line. After all, we are all sons and daughters of Adam, and it matters little if there should be here and there a gap or a hiatus in the long chain that runs through the generations. It is a pleasant thing for one to know that his forebears, as far back as he can trace them, were honest men and women and good self-supporting citizens. It may be a still finer thing to trace one's ancestors back to a Plantagenet, or some equally illustrious member of the human race; but what most concerns us to-day is not the past but the present. The life we ourselves are living is of far greater consequence to our day and generation than the fact that some one of our line fought at Hastings or came over in the Mayflower. If we are leading upright and useful lives and adding to the stock of human happiness by kindly deeds, we can afford to dispense with the ghostly memories of long-forgotten titles and warlike deeds. Pride of ancestry may be pardonable, but it is not a valuable asset in modern life in our republic where

> 'Tis only noble to be good;
> Kind hearts are more than coronets,
> And simple faith than Norman blood.

Magazine Financing

A STRIKING object lesson in peculiar methods of magazine financing in New York is furnished by the disaster which has overtaken one of the magazine publishing concerns. Hampton's, The Columbian and other publications controlled by the Columbian-Sterling Company, are involved in the failure of the latter, which went into the hands of a receiver October 12. In the charges made against the Columbian-Sterling concern, it is set forth that dividends have been paid to stockholders out of the proceeds of stock sales, instead of the earnings. There are many thousands of stockholders throughout the country who will suffer in consequence of the failure. It was, however, an inevitable sequel to a series of experiments which have been watched with interest and amazement by publishers generally, and which have no proper place in the legitimate publishing business. It is worthy of remark that nearly every publication that has sold stock widely to subscribers by similar tactics has ultimately gone down to disaster. There is but one plain path in the publishing business, as in all others—the well-trodden one of legitimate enterprise; and when a publication adopts the methods of the cheap stock-jobber, it is the beginning of the end. The present failure should serve as a warning to people against risking their money in doubtful ventures of the kind in future. A paper or magazine that cannot live on its merits, and by the legitimate sources of revenue open to all publications, is already out of the race, and its expedients to raise money are naturally viewed with deserved suspicion.

When Should Girls Marry?

GREAT interest has been aroused by the publication of the latest statistics of the marriages of college graduates. While the general average of divorces among non-college women is one in every twelve marriages, among college women the average is only one divorce in every fifty-seven marriages. A Smith College investigator has discovered that among the Smith alumnæ there is only one divorce in every eighty-five marriages.

Miss Angie C. Chapin, the acting Dean of Wellesley College, asserts that, since girls are usually from twenty to twenty-three years old when they graduate from college, they have passed the "childish" period, when emotion is the chief guide of action. Once over this period, sense and reason gradually assume the reins of conduct, and young women come to know their own minds, and can gauge the sources of happiness. Therefore they marry wisely.

Is the old theory about early marriage, which used to be advocated because the temperament of early youth is most easily adapted to new conditions, no longer tenable? Is it true that, as many modern philosophers claim, no woman should be ma... before the age of twenty-five? Let us hear ... the women readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ... to say on this important subject.

Taft's Perilous Ride

THE people of Tacoma were anxious for an appropriation to improve the roads in Mount - Rainier National Park, and insisted that Mr. ft and the presidential party make an auto trip the mountain. Over a stony and muddy road party went nearly to the highest point. The esident looked down 4,000 feet at a mountain eam almost directly below him, then up nearly the top of Mount Rainier, 14,528 feet above the . In the setting sun the Cascade Mountains ked exquisitely beautiful. "It is wonderful, nderful!" the President exclaimed. Darkness s coming on, and the party decided to return. t the car, in turning around, got stuck crosswise the mud, and much time and trouble were required get it started. The road wound treacherously ound the mountain, taking sharp turns unexpect- y and running beside a sheer drop of 4,000 feet. times the outside wheels were from one to two t of the edge of the precipice. In inky darkness, e cars crawled down the ten miles, reaching the tom after midnight. Very little talking was done, d all were quite nervous. The peril was great, but ailure to descend the mountain that night would ve disarranged the sched- so carefully prepared. the wheels of the cars re only within a few hes of the 4,000-foot nge, and as the mud of e road was made soft and ppery by the streams that ckled from the melted ow, increasing the danger, e condition of Mr. Taft d party could have been scribed by the words of vid:

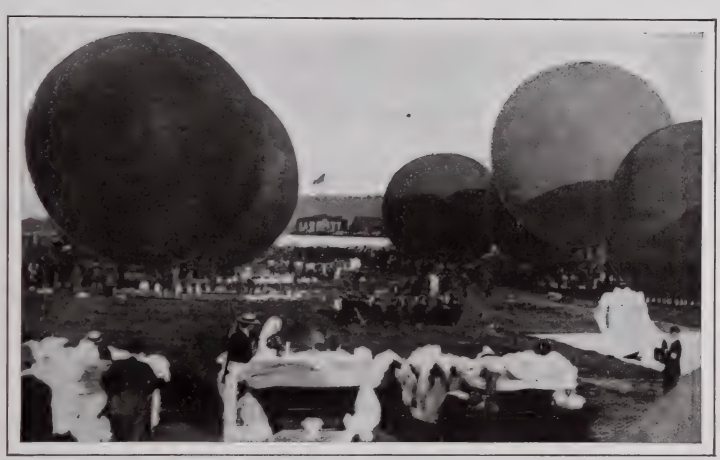
here is but a step between me d death. (I. Sam. 20:3.)

on Prize for Picture

Fred Stahr of Stapleton, aten Island, won the fa- ous Lazarus prize, awarded a committee of the Metro- litan Museum of Art. The cture which secured the ize he named "Good Gov- nment." It has a figure ated in the centre of the nvas; beside her stand o other draped figures, pifying Justice and Law. ehind these rises a great y, in which men, women d children are working, ith farms in the back- round. All the professions e paying tribute to the ntral figure. The prize ft by the will of Jacob azarus is $3,000; $1,000 a ar for three years for art udy in Rome. Stahr, who only thirty years of age, the son of a German artist, and himself had some ofessional training in the fatherland. The death his father threw the care of the family on him, d the drudgery of a temporal support left little me for high artistic work. As it was, the press of ork left him only seven days to begin and finish s picture. He has ambitions to reach the high titudes of art. In his visions of beauty and truth d in his personal ambitions he is fulfilling the ophecy:

Your young men shall see visions. (Joel 2:28.)

he Boys' Strike



A sympathetic strike in imitation of their fathers as been undertaken in many parts of England, d one has been reported in our country at Vilkes-Barre, Pa., where sixty-six pupils of the usiness department of the High School went out ecause they were displeased at the typewriting egulation. The schoolboys of Liverpool, the hot- ed of industrial disturbance, were the first in Eng- nd to demand relief from their hard lot. Parades ere held in the public streets with such banners s this, "What our fathers have done, we can do so," referring to the labor successes in the strike. he boys demanded the abolition of corporal pun- hment, shorter hours, and less study at home. he fever spread to London. A number of schools articipated in it. The little urchins got so numer- us and bold that they not only set guards at the school gates to prevent the entrance of those who desired to attend, but they used sticks, and clubs, and stones, and a detail of a dozen policemen was necessary to stop the nuisance. In Manchester a hero of twelve managed the campaign and seven schools were involved before the movement was checked. In all of the cities the grievances were the same, and the strikes in all of them were broken in the same way. The fathers and mothers took the cane against which the boys struck, and it struck against them, tanning their bodies as completely as the summer vacation sun had tanned their faces. The young heroes were led back to the teachers, and thus the folly was fittingly ended. Whatever may be one's opinion of corporal punishment in or out of school, it will be generally conceded that the words of the wise man are peculiarly appropriate in this instance.

He that spareth his rod hateth his son, and he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes. (Prov. 13:24.)

Symbol of International Friendship

The old stepping-stone in the public square of Hingham, England, over which feet had tramped for seven hundred years, was presented to the town of Hingham, Mass., the other day by Honorable James Bryce, the English Ambassador, in behalf of the people of the British village. John D. Long, ex-Secretary of the Navy, presided at the exercises, and Walter W. Horsey accepted the gift for the people of the town. Seated on the platform as representatives of Hingham families living elsewhere were ex-Governor Bates of Massachusetts, Robert T. Lincoln of Chicago, Charlemagne Tower of Philadelphia, E. C. James, president of the University of Illinois, and others. Mr. Bryce, in mentioning these families, said one of them was believed to have furnished the greatest American of the nineteenth century, Abraham Lincoln. Among other things, Mr. Bryce said: "The love of freedom in the state, the love of freedom in religion, the sense of duty to God and to conscience—it was for the sake of these things that they left their quiet Norfolk homes to face the stern winters of a new and almost unknown land, in whose forests lurked unknown dangers from wild beasts and wild men. And it was on the foundation of these principles that they built up their institutions here, set up their self-governing towns, legislated in the General Court of their self-governing colony and in due time joined in framing the constitution of their State and that of the Federal Republic. The friendship of nations is based on the friendship of individuals, and the power of understanding one another is the greatest help to friendship. So the old affection of the seventeenth century can be renewed to-day with a stronger sense than ever of what the nations have to unite them together." The seven-hundred-year-old stepping-stone, presented with such impressive ceremony, is to be used as the corner-stone for a bell-tower to commemorate the landing of the Hingham Pilgrims two hundred and seventy-five years ago. The tower will be a memorial of relationship and friendship not only, but of the liberty, virtue, and religion that are at the foundation of the character and progress of the English-speaking races. What a fitting cornerstone for such a memorial, and how it suggests the Chief Cornerstone on which alone the highest manhood and womanhood and best government can be built!

Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone. (Eph. 2:20.)

Preparing for the International Balloon Race

JUST at dusk on the afternoon of October 5 the six balloons which were entered in the International Gordon Bennett cup race rose from their grounds in Kansas City and sailed away to the northeast before a light breeze. The international entrants were: France—Balloon Condor, Emile Subonnet, pilot; Pierre Dupont, aide. Germany—Balloon Berlin I, Lieut. Leopold Vogt, pilot; Lieut. M. Schoeller, aide. Balloon Berlin II, Lieut. Hans Gericke, pilot; J. O. Dunker, aide. United States—Balloon Buckeye, Lieut. Frank P. Lahm, pilot; J. H. Wade, Jr., aide. Balloon America II, William F. Assmann, pilot; J. C. Hulbert, aide. Balloon Million Population Club, John Berry, pilot; Paul McCullough, aide. All of the balloons in this race were of 80,000 cubic feet capacity and filled with decarbonized natural gas. Four of the contestants abandoned the race on the second day, leaving two of the Americans to compete for the cup.

O'Leary Cow Exonerated

The fortieth anniversary of the fire which destroyed $200,000,000 worth of property and 300 precious lives was celebrated recently in Chicago. In Grant Park the beginning of the fire was staged in a realistic manner. A replica of Mrs. O'Leary's historical barn was fired as a feature of the evening's parade. A cow impersonated the famous animal which, according to the generally accepted belief, started the fire by kicking over a lamp. This belief, however, has been somewhat shattered, and the cow exonerated by Michael Ahern, the only living police reporter who "covered" the story, and who gives this version of the beginning of the tragedy: "The fire was not started by a cow kicking over a lamp while Mrs. O'Leary was milking the animal. The O'Learys were all in bed when the fire started. Mrs. O'Leary had milked her cows—she owned five—more than three hours before the fire was discovered. I knew Mrs. O'Leary well. She was a truthful woman. A few days after the fire I interviewed her regarding the story of the cow and the lamp. She branded it as a fabrication. It is true that the fire started in the O'Leary cow shed, and I have my reason for believing that some one went there to pilfer milk from one of the cows. There was a social gathering in the neighborhood that night in honor of the arrival of a young man from Ireland. One of those present told me in after years that two women of the party went to the O'Leary shed to get some milk for punch. One woman held a lighted lamp while the other milked the cow. They thought they heard some one coming, and in their haste to escape the lamp was dropped, setting fire to the place. That I believe is the true cause of the fire." Whatever theory of the origin of the fire may be correct, it remains true that most conflagrations in the material and moral realm have the smallest beginnings:

Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth. (James 3:5.)

Young Men and Bible

The Bible study classes of the Bedford Young Men's Christian Association of Brooklyn were opened the other evening with a banquet, at which more than a hundred young men who were interested in the various courses of study sat down to dinner. The notable event of the banquet was the address of Justice Crane of the Supreme Court on "Why a Man Should Study the Bible." The first reason he gave for such study was the literary value derived from it; the second, the moral effect it had on its readers; and last, but greatest of all, its spiritual influence in relating the soul to duty, to God, to fellow man, and to the great future that stretches out beyond the boundaries of time. In these days, when so much money is expended in providing educational instrumentalities, it is a matter of congratulation that so many of the Associations make the study of the Bible and the bringing of young men to Christ the main purpose for which the institution exists, in obedience to the command:

Search the scripture; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me. (John 5:39.)

The Gospel in Indian Bazaars

Preaching in the Bazaar at Chattapur

Some of the Native Audience

THE American Friends' Mission in India was established at Nowgong in Bundelkhand, Central India, in 1896. It is the only mission in a district of over a hundred square miles, with thousands of villages and a million of population. The work was opened at the time the great famine was raging, and many orphans were rescued and saved from starvation. Some were placed in other missions, but about fifty were kept in the orphanage at Nowgong, given an education and trained in industrial work. Some of these are now earnest preachers of the Gospel, and go on preaching tours through the villages of the district. From time to time other orphans have come to the mission, so that the number has kept between fifty and sixty all these years.

Many of the villages of the district have never yet been reached with the Gospel message. More respectful attention is given to the message of salvation if a white person is with the company. More workers are greatly needed in the mission. A doctor who was sent to the mission, after four years of faithful service, went home to God. The present force consists of four ladies, one of whom is now on furlough in the homeland, by a physician's advice.

A good bungalow and orphanage buildings are t the mission premises. A chapel has been erec in the bazaar by Dr. A. T. Pierson and his fam in memory of his daughter, Louise B. Pierson, v died while visiting the mission, and a small hospi is being erected by the friends of the doctor v gave her life for the mission.

Men and their wives are needed for evangelis medical, educational and industrial work in conn tion with the mission. Miss Rachel Pim, 176 W Oxford Street, Alliance, Ohio, is Correspond Secretary of the Board, having charge of the wo and will answer all inquiries.

Five Wisconsin Counties Swept by Flood

A SCORE of towns and hundreds of acres of rich farm land along the Black River were inundated on October 7 as a result of the heavy floods in northern Wisconsin, which caused the Black River to cut its way around two huge concrete dams and rush down upon the lower land. Five lowlying counties were affected by the flood. Black River Falls, thirty miles northeast of La Crosse, with a population of 2,000, was washed away when the millions of gallons of water confined by the Hatfield dam swept down upon the town five miles below. The Dells dam, five miles above Hatfield, was also made useless. These two dams, intact, stood like islands in the midst of the torrents. The granite hills, between which the dams were built, gave way and let the water escape, to carry destruction to the lowlands farther down the river.

Heavy rains had been falling all the previous week and the dams were in danger two days before the break came. Hu dreds of men worked day a night trying to check the wa that was gnawing its w through the concrete structu but their efforts were in va The people who lived below t dams were warned of the i pending flood and most of tha escaped to higher ground, car ing what valuables they co hastily gather together.

The Hatfield Dam, Cut from the Bank by the Black River

The Black River flood is d ferent from the Austin cat trophe in that the high wa continued and it was for da impossible to reach the in dated towns. Houses and ba were carried down the river a hundreds of horses and cat have been drowned. Brid have been washed out all alo the river and the torrent h been so high that it was alm impossible to cross it in a b with any degree of safety.

Food supplies and oth things needed for the tem rary relief of the homeless w immediately forwarded fr La Crosse to the flooded d trict.

CHANGING THE MAP OF THE NATIONS

WITH the landing of 35,000 troops in Tripoli, Italy seems to have finally settled the fate of that country. The transports bearing the Italian expeditionary force were greeted on the water front of the city by a great throng of Europeans and natives, all of whom seemed equally delighted at the establishment of Italian military rule. The Italian colors were run up on the flagstaffs of all the public buildings and many of the business places which had been reopened since the withdrawal of the Turkish forces to the interior of the country. All the warships were dressed with bunting, and fired salutes. The transports were escorted by four warships and a flotilla of torpedo boats and destroyers. The Turkish troops, which formerly occupied the city of Tripoli, have been undergoing great privations and hardships in the interior of the country. The soldiers were without shelter of any kind, and were exposed to the blazing sun and blinding sand of the desert. Many deserted their regiments, and though the dispatches from Constantinople state that there will be no surrender in Tripoli, it is believed that the Turkish officers have been forced by their desperate situation to open negotiations with the newly appointed Italian Governor, with a view to surrender.

The Italian ministry of public works is already preparing a plan to revive the industry and commerce of Tripoli. A special commission is being sent there to decide what railway lines shall first be built. Within a few weeks it is hoped to establish direct cable communication between the city of Tripoli and Syracuse. At the same time the Italian war office is studying the organization of a permanent body of colonial troops which will be required for the protection of the country after the war is over.

The most recent dispatches from Constantinople state that the Turkish Government is in a state of chaos. "The problem of reconcil'ng Islamism and Constitutionalism," says the correspondent, "has proved insoluble, and the Young Turkish régime is sick unto death. It is not impossible that pres events may lead to the deposition of the Sultan, military section of the Committee of Union a Progress being in favor of placing the heir appare Prince Yussuf, on the throne. Yussuf is credi with an iron will and great political sagacity."

That the arrangement of a treaty of peace tween the conflicting countries may not bring ab an absolute cessation of hostilities is indicated reports that have been received from Yemen to effect that Imam Yahya has proclaimed a h war. Consular reports that have reached the It ian Government state that thirty Italians who w employed on the Hedjaz Railway on the bounda line between Egypt and Syria were massacred ea in October.

In spite of these minor hostilities and the prot tations of a firm intention to fight which come fr Constantinople there seems little doubt that control of Turkey over the north African provin has been completely destroyed.

A Metropolitan Cooking Campaign

THE dwellers in the congested districts of our big cities—those whom we commonly designate as the "poorer class"—have it impressed upon them often enough that nourishing food is necessary to keep the body in good working condition, which is the equivalent of saying that the breadwinner must have the right things to eat in order to earn his weekly wages. Stress is also laid upon the fact that not only is his own physical well-being of great importance, but that of the children in the family even more so. Their tiny bodies need health-giving foods in sufficient quantities to sustain and build them up at the same time. These facts are reiterated time and again. Why, then, is it that mothers continue to feed their infants on strong tea and coffee, that a staple of indigestible meat swimming in greasy gravy forms the principal meal in many homes, and that sanitary precautions in the matter of buying and preparing food-stuffs are so universally disregarded?

The answer is that these people are not "make bricks without straw," and straw in this connection being by no means funds alone, but accurate, definite, simplified culinary knowledge. Ignorance is generally at the root of most of the big problems of the world. The whys and wherefores must first be explained to better conditions in any field. It is the recognition of this truth, together with an earnest endeavor to act in accordance with it, that has marked with success the free cooking lessons that are being carried on, winter and summer, in our greatest American city. Wives and mothers, even those most in need of instruction, cannot be depended upon to search for it, nor would they always be able to if the desire existed; the New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, therefore, takes it to them.

This particular branch of the work is in the hands of a capable dietitian and cooking instructor, Miss Winifred S. Gibbs, ably assisted by Miss Helen F. Smith. Do you gasp as you mentally figure out that as against New York's millions, with the relentless needy homes such numbers stand for, the efforts of two women, faithful and devoted though they be, must be of little account? A titanic task it assuredly seems at first thought; yet when we consider that the instruction given the few is not limited to ten or a dozen, but extends in an ever widening circle of influence, the results are far from disheartening. In the humble, crowded sections of the city, a very little leaven may be made to leaven a surprisingly big lump.

Actual demonstration forms a very essential part of the work, and this is conducted in the family kitchen itself. There is no politely worded invitation to attend cooking lectures at some hall or schoolroom, to which the mothers may respond with varying degrees of interest—or indifference. On the contrary, they watch interestedly in their own familiar environment improved methods of cooking on a practical basis and with the aid of their own utensils. If the family is very poor—the father being out of employment, for instance—the necessary appliances may not be at hand. Under these conditions, the association furnishes them until the period of distress is tided over. Generally that kitchen which is best lighted and equipped forms the culinary centre, and in it the neighbors congregate to watch and take note of proceedings. Sometimes they understand English and can follow the little talk with comparative ease; often not. In the latter case, the children have to be resorted to as interpreters. They prove an acceptable go-between, however, grounded as they are in English at school and in the foreign tongue at home. Irish, Italians, Hebrews, Bohemians, and Armenians are among the nationalities represented at these gatherings.

One admirable feature of these cooking courses is the application of practical ideas and methods to the work in hand. The income of the head of the family is considered first of all, and care is taken that between it and the table expenses the right ratio shall exist. For example, entirely different bills of fare are prepared for the family who can afford to spend but four dollars and a half a week for food than for the family who can make an allowance of half as much again. In the cheaper dietary, less variety is introduced and less expensive (but equally nourishing) foods substituted.

While this work has been carried on principally in the homes, a new departure was introduced last year in the extension of the lectures to the city recreation piers. The advantages gained by the use of such unique schoolrooms are obvious. Away from the heat and odor of tiny rooms, fanned and refreshed by the river breezes, overworked, tired mothers have listened with renewed enthusiasm to this out-of-door instruction. At certain piers, booths (open at the top) erected by the Board of Health have been brought into service. This has provided seclusion and made possible the use of an oil-stove in demonstrating the preparation of simple foods without, however, cutting off the supply of fresh air. Five piers have been visited and lectures given on alternate weeks.

A Lesson to a Group of Mothers in a Tenement Kitchen

A "Little Mother" Learning for the Household

That the summer series has been fairly comprehensive, however, can be gleaned from the outline of work conducted during the hot months. The preliminary lesson consisted of a practical talk on general topics, such as "What Food Should Do for Us;" "Badly Selected and Badly Cooked Food;" "Necessary Knowledge for Planning Proper Meals;" and "Marketing and Buying." At the second lecture, the subject of "Milk and Proper Feeding of Infants" was taken up. Lecture number three—and this was of seasonable importance—had for its topic "Hot Weather Food," under which general heading were included "What to Eat in Hot Weather;" "What to Avoid;" "Refreshing Drinks," etc. "Proper Food for Children" (of the age to require three regular meals a day) was considered in the fourth talk, while during the fifth lesson actual cooked dietaries were exhibited. A breakfast tray containing a mould of cereal, three or four prunes, buttered bread, and cup of cocoa, together with samples of cocoa shells and cereal coffee, furnished the text for such statements as that there were pleasing drink substitutes for tea and coffee that did not affect the nerves, that the occasional introduction of fruit would often tempt the child's appetite where a plain cereal would not, and that, above all, dainty arrangements and serving of food should be aimed at. The dinner tray with a steak ball, simple vegetable, baked potato, and custard, afforded the speaker an opportunity to impress upon her hearers the right way to cook meat and vegetables and the desirability of providing a simple, digestible dessert two or three times a week in the place of greasy pastry. Lastly, the supper tray, displaying a soft-boiled egg, baked apple, zwieback, and milk, illustrated the point that the child's stomach should receive only light food directly before bedtime.

Interested questions and answers passed between instructor and pupils. "I tried the eggs you told me about," one woman remarked, with enthusiastic but ungrammatical ardor, "and they was fine. I've told ever so many how to cook them." Another, "How did you say you could fry that meat without its being greasy?" while a little girl spoke up, "My mother sent me to ask you something." Often it is the "little mothers" who not only carry home cooking hints to the grown-ups who are there detained by work or sickness, but test for themselves what they have heard on the pier.

Though the instruction given is backed by sound, scientific principles, no technical terms are allowed to creep into the talks. The lesson itself is supplemented by typewritten outlines covering the main points studied, and these papers are distributed for home use. Of their own accord women will sometimes ask for extra copies for their neighbors who are not present. The slips serve as a more dependable guide than memory and encourage a more than momentary interest in the work.

As the majority of families for whom the cooking classes are intended are of very limited means or even on the verge of poverty, the expenditure of money for any but the absolutely essential household appliances is out of the question. Now and then, however, it has been found practicable to apply some of the newer culinary discoveries on a modest scale where it involves no great outlay.

To sum it all up, the wives and mothers among whom this missionary work is carried on are waking up to the fact that the daily programme should not consist of the automatic routine of three meals a day, regardless of quantity and quality, and that the lowest priced article of food is not always the cheapest in the end. To their query "Why not?" or "What makes this or that harmful?" there is always a willing answer ready, suited to their comprehension.

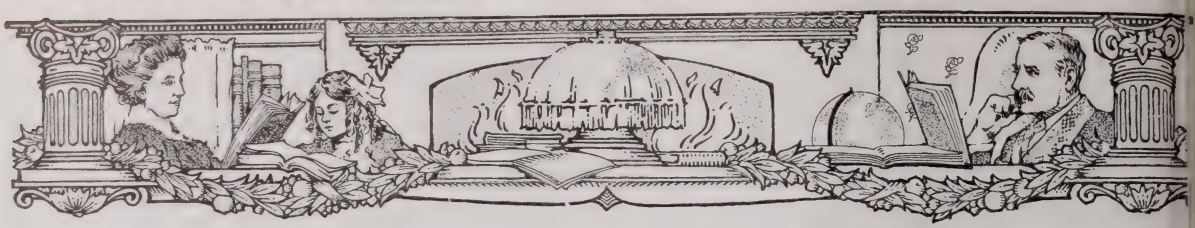
TOPICS OF INTEREST THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

—A DOZEN MEN WERE injured, some, it is believed, mortally, and forty others were entombed in the Lewis Mine near Superior, Col., on the afternoon of October 9, following the explosion of half a ton of dynamite. The explosion, which was caused by fire, wrecked the main shaft of the mine. Rescue parties immediately started work removing the debris to release the buried men.

—ON OCTOBER 10, with every outward evidence of general regret, Ottawa bade farewell to Earl Grey, the departing Governor-General of Canada. The farewell was national in scope, for among the thousands who were present at the station when the train pulled out were Premier Borden with every member of his Cabinet, the judges of Canada's Supreme Court, and the members of the old Laurier Cabinet. Lady Laurier presented a large bouquet to Earl Grey. As the train pulled out the big crowd sang "Auld Lang Syne."



—THE WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION of Georgia, presented by Mrs. M. Cora Rowe of Atlanta, Ga., the superintendent of the sailors' work, recently presented to the battleship Georgia 932 comfort bags for the officers and crew. This is the second lot of such bags that has been presented to the sailors. Those for the Georgia were of maroon rep with the State coat-of-arms embroidered in silver thread. Mrs. Rowe received the thanks of the captain on behalf of the officers and men.

—A WIRELESS TELEGRAPH DETACHMENT of sixteen men will be formed in the signal corps of the Cornell University cadet battalion, according to the plans of Lieutenant W. A. Gilmore, U.S.A., who has been detailed there as Professor of Military Science and Tactics. One or two of the cadets have had experience in wireless, and the others will work at the instruments during the winter so that they may be used in the battalion manœuvres, which will be held next spring.

—A DISPATCH FROM MADRID, SPAIN, states that the Spanish losses in an engagement between two Spanish columns and tribesmen in the Kert River section of Morocco on Saturday, October 7, were 36 killed and 109 wounded. The Spanish column, in resuming operations against the hostile tribes, advanced ten miles inland, burning houses and driving the tribesmen from their positions. They met with determined resistance. The operations were directed by the Minister of War in person.

—THE LAKE MOHONK CONFERENCE on International Arbitration on October 9 announced the opening of its fourth annual prize contest for the best essay on "International Arbitration" by an undergraduate male student of any college or university in the United States or Canada. The prize of $100 is given by Chester De Witt Pugsley. The conference also announced two prizes of $200 and $100, given by Mrs. Elmer Black of New York for the best essays on "International Peace" by undergraduate women students of colleges in the United States. The contests close March 15 next.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

At the Wrong End

"SHE gets hold of the boy at the wrong end," said a friend of the family in allusion to a boy and his mother. Although mother and son were devoted to one another their temperaments were antagonistic. The mother had a fatal tendency to exasperate the boy by commands given in a peremptory tone when gentle requests would have been quite as effective, by scolding him before strangers and retailing his faults in the hearing of the family circle. The boy who did remarkably well in school and was a favorite with his teachers never seemed to get on smoothly at home, and invariably behaved there in a manner unworthy of his better self. What was to be done became a puzzle.

At times it almost seemed that the mother in her continual fault-finding had alienated her own affection as well as retarded the growth of esteem in a boy who had reached the critical plane of the early teens. The trouble was that she took hold of her child's training at the wrong end.

No one can hope to influence a boy for his good unless she possesses tact, courage and self-control. Tact and self-control are essential elements in home comfort. A woman who is destitute of these qualities will seldom manage her household well. There will surely be friction. The quality of courage is as useful and necessary as either of the others, not merely physical but moral courage. A mother should at all times dare to be frank, to tell the truth in loving kindness and to exact the deference which is her due.

The mother of Frances Willard was more than ordinarily successful in training her children in strength and integrity. She used to say that she praised much and blamed little, and if one of the children appeared to be cross and unreasonable, she would express surprise and say, "What has become of the dear child who was here yesterday?" We have all heard of the remarkable character of the mother of Washington, and we have been told that the stepmother of Abraham Lincoln had a great deal to do in shaping the early life of that magnificent man. Mothers do not wholly make men. Fathers have an equal responsibility, yet it is a fact that the mother hand does much of the moulding in the earliest years, and the mother love drops its sweetness into the heart of the boy who will by and by be in the front of the world's work.

No two children in a home are precisely alike. Each should be studied and treated as an individual. It goes without saying that we shall make mistakes even when we try hardest to do our best. We need not make the mistake of losing the confidence and drifting outside the sympathy of the growing boy. His mother's first duty is to understand him. Do not let business, pleasure, housework or society come between you and that boy of yours. Do not take hold of him at the wrong end.

About Lending Books

THE real book-lover often hesitates to lend a book for two reasons. The first is naturally that books sometimes return from a temporary stay in another house very much the worse for wear. A book should be handled as if it were a bit of precious property. The book-borrower may or may not be conscientious in treating a book well. The mere opening of a book may hopelessly ruin its binding, and if it be passed from one to another in a heedless household, it will surely come home looking woe-begone and weary. A book has a personality of its own which the book-lover recognizes. A book is not simply to be read. It is to stand on the shelf, to impart a friendly and comfortable air to a room, to be taken down in the twilight and touched with reverence, while the spirit of the printed page in a strange and subtle way holds communion with one's own.

The second reason for hesitation in lending a book is concerned with the pain and regret that come to pass as a bit of experience when the second person lacks the enthusiasm of the first. For example, in these days, many of us have been reading works from the versatile pen of Arnold Bennett. We have been poring over the pages of William De Morgan. We have read with positive delight the essays of Arthur C. Benson, or we have been kindled to new thought by the crisp suggestions of G. K. Chesterton. We lend a book that we have read with enthusiasm, to a friend, who carries it away, reads it and returns it without an atom of our appreciation and with words of cold criticism. Either the virile English of one writer and his description of homely people and homely scenes have disappointed our friend, or the philosophy of another has failed to charm her, or she has missed the point of the sparkling essays, and as she frankly tells us her opinion of our beloved books, we feel as though a dash of cold water had been thrown in our face. The joy of lending a book and the satisfaction involved in the incident depend entirely on the way the book is received by reader number two. Of course, when books are borrowed from a library the transaction belongs to business, and ceases to enter the domain of friendship.

Something New

WE have grown so accustomed to the entrance of women upon fields hitherto occupied by men that when a mere man dares to invad[e] occupation largely controlled and [e]empted by women, we are a little [s]prised. Nevertheless a young [m] recently enrolled himself in a clas[s] in domestic science in which the stud[ents] were all feminine. He was rega[rded] by his classmates with a little [s]prise, but by no means with aver[sion]. Indeed, the solitary man was [more] than tolerated, it may be supposed [by] the charming girls who were his [com]panions. There is no reason wh[y a] man should not study domestic sci[ence] if he likes. In the particular case [the] student's object was preparation [for] a practical nature for a future lec[ture] course which he intended to give. [The] best cooks in the world, and incid[en]tally the most highly p[aid], are men, and whenever a man undertakes to c[ook] on dressmaking, millin[ery] or any other distinctly feminine art or trade [he] succeeds because he is painstaking and accur[ate].

One of the most po[pu]lar and magnetic mi[n]isters in the Presbyter[ian] Church, a man who [has] had a wonderful record of usefulness, was in [his] youth the only lad in a large Bible class of gi[rls]. He was seventeen, [and] they were somewhere [in] the same neighborhood [in] to age. There was [no] other Bible class which he could enter, and he [de]sired to be taught by [an] excellent instructor whe[se] ability was given to [the] benefit of the gi[rls]. Whenever and wherever a young man or woman is in earnest and determined to learn, slight obstacles will be pushed aside.

Making War Upon the Bi[rds]

IN Montclair, N. J., the[re] has been waged of l[ate] a singular warfare agai[nst] the birds. It might [be] called briefly, "A Lad[ies'] Battle," since nervo[us] women were the chief co[m]plainants in the case, [and] the chief foes of our lit[tle] brothers of the air. The[se] are, fortunately, wom[en] who have nerves und[er] control and are not co[n]stantly making an outcry when a dog barks, a cat mews, a squir[rel] rustles through the branches, or a bird sings in the morning. The[y] lifted up their voices in protest, yet it was only after a struggle that th[ey] were able to stop the slaughter of grackles, starlings and even robi[ns] that were shot as they were nesting in the branches. Northern New J[er]sey has been a birds' paradise, a[nd] those who are driving our feather[ed] friends away may live to see th[e] mistake and regret their cruel[ty]. When the birds are gone, insect pe[sts] will multiply. Looking back a f[ew] years, some of us can remember su[m]mer walks when worms and caterp[il]lars fell from the trees on our nec[ks] and arms, and when vegetation w[as] destroyed by numerous crawling a[nd] creeping things now held in check [by] our bird neighbors.

A Wedding Party in Tripoli

IT is the custom of the groom with a party of his friends and relatives to call at the home of the bride with a conveyance of as pretentious a sort as his means will allow. The camel is considered the most appropriate animal for this honored task of conveying the bride to her new home. It is notable that neither the bride nor her attendant is veiled according to the custom of Mohammedan countries. This is occasioned by the fact that the photograph was taken in the territory of one of the inland tribes, where veiling is not so prevalent as at the coast.

OUR BOYS AND GIRLS

All Hallowe'en at the Parsonage

IF YOU make up your minds not to frighten any one, there is more genuine fun in a well-planned Hallowe'en party than almost any other kind of a good time." I happened to be in the little village of Ossipee Pocket, in the White Hills of New Hampshire, last autumn, and the pastor's wife said this to me at market one morning. And when All-Hallowe'en came along we were invited, on the dearest little calling cards, decorated with witches and jack-o'-lanterns, to spend the evening at the parsonage. How I wish you might all have been there to see for yourselves what a quaint, sweet party it was! I shall never forget the slightest detail of it.

An Orange Jack-o'-Lantern

Hallowe'en Games

WE NAMED chestnuts and roasted them before the open fire, and when a boy and girl chestnut jumped toward each other that clearly indicates another wedding at the parsonage," the pastor would say, and then he quizzically set forth the details of the only wedding that had been in the parsonage in ten years. If two chestnut boys separated and went each his own way, "so will those for whom the nuts are named," the parson said, laughing heartily at his own good little joke; for it is pretty safe to prophesy that most boys will in time separate and go their own way. Should two girls by chance go hopping off together they were sure to be treated as jealous rivals, and when a nut fizzled, popped all to pieces or burned up, "end of trouble, happy days ahead," he would always say, using his long forefinger to point his words. The charm of naming chestnuts lay not at all in the prophecies, of course—for they were only a necessary part of the game—but in the clever little chestnut tales that the minister, laughing, told as fast as they happened.

The Alphabet Game

WE TIED a wedding ring to a long hair suspended over a goblet and started it swinging slowly, while each in turn repeated the alphabet. Whenever the ring struck the goblet we began saying the alphabet all over again, and in some such way as this we played that we spelled out the name of our future husband. It was so old-fashioned and funny, and the pastor fixed up such odds and ends of "matches," all in such a benign and good-natured way that we laughed and clapped merrily at the surprise and genuine good fun of it.

Apple-Bobbing

THE way we bobbed for apples was original too, for in each apple there had been buried a bean, a grain of corn, or a button. If you captured an apple with a bean in it, "yours will be a farmer's life, with peace and plenty and a pretty wife," the pastor's pretty wife would say. The grain of corn tells that you will follow a profession, and at sight of a button in a rosy-cheeked pippin the bright little lady would promptly stand you up and count out on your every button the old rigamarole, "rich man, poor man, beggar man, thief, doctor, lawyer, merchant, chief, tinker, tailor, soldier, sailor," etc. The apple-bobbing lasted less than twenty minutes, but it was jolliest of all the games except perhaps

Sheets and Pillow Cases

DRAPED in snowy sheets and pillow cases and wearing funny little black silesia masks to make us look grim, we played Musical Chairs to extremely solemn music. The one who captured the last chair and the one who didn't were presented very seriously and ceremoniously with jack-o'-lamps made of oranges and Christmas candles, and were sent into the attic to find their prizes, which were penwiper witches made out of wish-bones and sealing wax.

Fishing for Fortunes

IT WAS a beautiful moonlight night, and about nine o'clock we were invited to step out to the rain-barrel and the watering trough, where plenty of tiny "wishing boats" made of English walnut-shells, in which small bits of Christmas tree candles were fastened, bobbed about waiting to bring us good luck. First we selected each our cockle-shell and lighted the candle; then we stirred up the water, and with a piece of stick, to which was tied about ten inches of string and a tiny fishing-hook, we fished for our fortunes. Because, you see, there were little mottoes made of candy hearts and out of sugar kisses, slyly tucked away in each shell. "Furthermore," the pastor's wife declared, "the boats that stay near shore tell of a stay-at-home life; if two boats drift together, then those to whom they belong will be life-long friends; the shells that ride the waves safely tell of even, happy lives; and if a tiny boat comes persistently back to shore, in its pretty way, it may be saying something to you about many short journeys you will be taking. If the candle burns brightly to the end, then all goes merrily forevermore. If it sputters and blows out, then every little annoying thing that has been troubling you of late will go out this very night." And so it was we went from one charming and well-planned Hallowe'en game to another.

There was a wonderful magic lantern rigged up in the barn. The Hallowe'en supper was just as original and charming as the things I have already told you about, and there was a delightful ghost story that ended happy ever after. But my space is very limited, so if you would like to know more about Hallowe'en parties and how to get them up you may write and ask the Aunt in the Cozy Corner.

Evening Entertainment

TO ALL who send for it, enclosing a self-addressed and stamped envelope, I will send a delightful cut-out shadow-story for a Hallowe'en evening's entertainment. I would specially like every one to have a copy of the shadow cut-out story, because we played and told it when we were boys and girls at home. So I hope you will all send for it, and I wish you such a happy Hallowe'en.

Good-Night Verse

Now the darkness gathers,
Stars begin to peep;
Birds, and beasts, and flowers
Soon will be asleep.

Through the long night watches
May the angels spread
Their white wings above me,
Watching round my bed.

Special Prize Notice

EVERY one should enter the prize contest this week. The large photograph and souvenir postal cards are exceptionally charming and worth your working for. Remember that in every instance the age of the contestant is taken into consideration in awarding Cozy Corner prizes, so that every one, big and little, has a fair and equal chance to earn one. Put your name and age and address clearly on your work and send it in before November 15. Thanking you all for your nice letters, and assuring you of my constant interest, I am,

Faithfully and lovingly always,

"The Old Woman and Her Cats," by Ludwig Knaus

THIS is one of the most spirited and popular paintings in the great Metropolitan Museum of Art. Sitting by the fireplace in a grimy old stone-paved kitchen, an ancient dame leaning on a cane is watching a family of kittens frolic in the light of the fire. For the best original story or verse entitled "The Old Woman and Her Cats," we will give a beautiful solio photograph of the painting, 10 x 8 inches, and for next best stories or verses in order of merit, twenty prizes of artistic post card pictures of the famous painting.

In every nursery, should be a cake of Ivory Soap.

The need for it arises a dozen times a day—not for the bath only, but for shampooing; for removing spots and stains from baby's dresses and underwear; and for cleaning bottles and other receptacles for food.

For these purposes, and for many others that might be named, a pure soap is absolutely necessary.

Ivory Soap is pure.

There is no "free" alkali in Ivory Soap. That is why it will not injure the finest fabric or the most sensitive skin.

China's Uncrowned King

UPON the death of Sir Robert Hart at Fingest Lodge, Great Marlow, England, on September 20, one of the most romantic figures of modern history passed from the ranks of the world's great organizers and diplomats. Sir Robert was born at Milltown, County Armagh, in Ireland, on February 20, 1835. After receiving a degree from Queen's College, Belfast, he entered the British consular service and went to China as a student-interpreter when only nineteen years of age. From that time until his return to England in 1908 he passed his whole life in China.

In 1863 he resigned from the consular service to accept the appointment as Inspector General of Customs under the Chinese Government. His influence in this position upon the development of Chinese commerce with other lands was enormous. He brought about the modernization of the coast lights of China and exerted a great influence on the Imperial Government's relations to foreign powers. He became a power in the land, and at the time of his retirement had undoubtedly given a stronger impetus to the desire of the Chinese for the benefits of Western civilization than any other foreigner. He was a great provider of money for the Chinese Government, and gained its utmost confidence. The ministers of other Powers consulted him in every difficulty. In 1885 he was offered the post of British ambassador at Pekin, but the indispensable nature of his work in connection with the marine customs brought him back to his old position, which he occupied until illness compelled him in 1908 to return to England on leave of absence.

The Late Sir Robert Hart
The Famous Inspector-General of Customs in China

Since his death, he has, by an Imperial Chinese edict, been awarded the brevet rank of Senior Guardian to the Heir-Apparent. This edict shows how he was appreciated in China, and gives a good summary of his career as Inspector-General of Customs. "Sir Robert Hart," it says, "performed many duties in China in connection with the establishment of the Customs, the organization of the coastal light-house system, the foundation of Tungwen College, the participation in International Exhibitions abroad, and the creation of the post office, highly satisfactory results being attained in each instance; while in diplomatic questions he has frequently filled consultative functions. He labored for China during half a century, and his assistance was of great value. We extremely deplore his death." It will now perhaps be possible for a full biography of his unique career to be given to the world. From the story of his life published two years ago by his niece, Miss Juliet Bredon, his modesty, it is said, caused to be omitted many things which would have increased his reputation.

In telling of the overshadowing of God's providence in his life, Sir Robert once said that an old friend of his, named Russell, came to preach at Pekin, at a certain church where he used to worship. But there had been changes in the form of service that Sir Robert did not like, and he had not been in that church for eighteen months. That morning he went to hear his old friend preach. Russell's first hymn was, "God moves in a mysterious way." After the service Sir Robert went into the vestry, and found Russell very busy. "Hart," he said, "I have no time now. I'll come round to see you on Tuesday." Now, during the service Sir Robert Hart had noticed that a certain high official was not present that morning. He ought to have been there. Why wasn't he there? Was he ill? If not, what was he doing? To the busy brain speculating on this man's absence there came the resolve to hunt him up, and see what was wrong. He went to his house.

"Wait a moment," said this dignitary, hastily signing some documents. Then, throwing down his pen, he said, "There! that means war." "Don't you think you have made a mistake? Haven't you been a little hasty? Are you sure you have weighed all the facts?" said Sir Robert to him. "Well, I'll give you two hours to convince me I am wrong," he replied. He was convinced, the papers destroyed, and war averted. On Tuesday Russell came. "Hart," he said, "I don't know why I am here. My people at Ningpo say I am sent to promote peace. I cannot see it. I feel bound. I cannot move a step." Then Sir Robert said, "You remember that first hymn you gave out, 'God moves in a mysterious way'?" and he showed him the hand of God in it all. "I should never have gone to that church if you had not been the preacher that morning. I should not have known of the absence of that official. Truly, 'God moves in a mysterious way.'"

At another time war was imminent. Certain high officials handed him a telegram that he knew would provoke war if sent. He tried to reason with them. It was useless. He went down to his office wondering what he could do, and began walking round the room. Quite unconsciously, he put out his hand and took a book from the shelves, and quite as unconsciously opened it. His eyes fell on a saying of Confucius, "He that sets out to build a hill must not refuse at the last basket of earth." What did it mean? Surely nothing else but "try again." He held back the telegram, and next morning went once more to the officials. He was greeted with the words, "Have you sent that telegram?" "No," he replied. "Well, it's all right. It doesn't matter. We've changed our minds." Silently Sir Robert Hart thanked God for the message that came from him, through his servant, the Chinese sage.

Hold Thou Me

HOLD Thou me up whene'er the way is hidden.
And clouds hang darkly in the sky above;
When wild misgivings come to me unbidden—
O Father, hold me closely in thy love.

Hold Thou me up under each new temptation,
Lest I should fall beneath its subtle power;
Thou, who art ever near, be my salvation,
My rock, my fortress, in the trying hour.

Hold Thou me up when my weak heart is failing
Before the troubles of the way I take;
Make me to feel that Thou art all-prevailing—
That Thou wilt succor me for Jesus' sake.

Hold Thou me up, O Lord my God, whenever
The flowers of pleasure spring around my days,
And let no fancied joy my spirit sever
From Thee, who gavest me Thy love always.

Hold Thou me up till I in death am sleeping—
Till I am far from danger, safe and free,
In that fair land where, in Thy gracious keeping,
I rest for evermore at home with Thee.

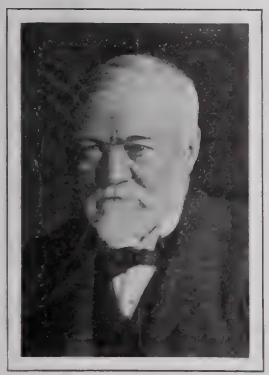
The Carnegie Peace Fund

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been asked to explain in just what manner the munificent gift of $10,000,000, presented by Mr. Andrew Carnegie to advance the cause of International Peace and Arbitration, is to be spent. At the Peace Conference held last May at Lake Mohonk, the Hon. James Brown Scott, as Trustee and Executive Secretary of the Carnegie Endowment, and Director of its Division of International Law, described fully the disposition which it is intended shall be made of this vast sum.



Dr. Scott reviewed briefly the progress of civilization, in which war has played so prominent a part, and enumerated the obstacles which the great peace movement is encountering. He reminded his hearers of the seriousness of those who, like the German Emperor and some of his great teachers, Von Moltke, believe that the only virtues developed chiefly on war and their development, and that, in the inscrutable Providence of God, peace can be secured only by maintaining great standing armies and navies.

Dr. Scott affirmed that we must show to such opponents and to all others that we have a substitute for the god of war, and one "so reasonable that its rejection would be unreasonable."

To this end, the trustees of the Carnegie Endowment have made of their work three divisions, namely: International Law; Economics and History; Intercourse and Education.

In the first of these, Dr. Scott is empowered to associate with himself some of the great international lawyers of the world. They will study to plant in all the great nations the right ideas of international justice. The expenses of these eminent workers, their conferences and their publications will be borne by the fund.

Dr. John Bates Clark, the distinguished Columbia economist, is at the head of the second division. The study of the economic causes and effects of wars, and the relation between the appalling expenditures for war and international well-being, will be the subject of researches in this department.

Copyright by Underwood & Underwood

Mr. Andrew Carnegie

A director for the third division has not yet been secured. Its task is to bring into communication the leading peace-advocates of different lands; to promote acquaintance and good feeling between distant nations; and to introduce into the educational systems of all countries explicit and intelligent teachings of peace-theories.

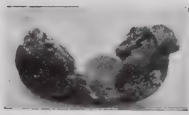
In the Oriental Review (a New York magazine) for September 25, 1911, there is given a detailed statement of the subsidiary objects aimed at in each of these three great divisions. In almost every peace publication and in many of the speeches at the wonderful May Conference, the formation of peace societies in every community has been strongly urged. The easiest and surest way in which to exert the influence which every one of us desires to exert in favor of this truly divine movement, is by joining or by helping to form one of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Peace Circles.

Among the Workers

—REV. GEORGE W. MOONEY, long active in Methodism, has been appointed Eastern Financial Secretary of Taylor University, Upland, Indiana.

—THE GOLDEN JUBILEE to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the services of Rev. Frank[illegible] Babbitt as rector of Grace Episcopal Church, Nyack, N. Y., took place on October 13. Mr. Babbitt is greatly beloved throughout a large section of the Hudson Valley. His work for fifteen years was in a sense pioneer. There was no money to pay either organist or sexton, but Dr. Babbitt acted in both capacities as well as attending to his other duties for fifteen years. He has built up a beautiful church, free from debt, which has a large and growing congregation.

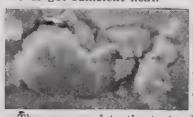
—EVANGELIST A. J. FITT, of Denver, Col., recently closed a six months' revival campaign in California. He was at Placerville three weeks, and the church was greatly blessed. His record for this field is remarkable. He was successful at every point. At Fairfield, Santa Rosa Springs, St. Helena, and Farmington he was a great help to the pastors, who hope to have him return to California another season. Mr. Fitt has returned East for a campaign in the Central States.



—THE THIRD ANNIVERSARY of the pastorate of the Rev. Dr. Daniel Hoffman Martin over the "Old First" Presbyterian Church of Glens Falls, N. Y., was celebrated by a men's dinner recently at which nearly two hundred men partook. Colonel John L. Cunningham presided and spoke of the growth and prosperity of the church under the present leadership, making it the banner church in the presbytery in numerical strength. At this dinner also plans were formulated for a men's "every member" canvass of the parish in the interest of greater gifts for foreign missions. A larger church office to cost something like a quarter of a million was also discussed.

—THE REV. PARLEY E. ZARTMANN, D.D., of Jamaica, N. Y., so long associated with Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman and the Evangelistic Committee of the Presbyterian Church, has accepted a call to the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago. His nominal position at first is that of assistant to the dean, Dr. James M. Gray, but it is understood that ultimately he will become the executive head of the Extension Department of the institute. This branch of the work is increasing its borders in the sending out of men and women as evangelists and Bible teachers, and Dr. Zartmann's acquaintance with the church leaders and religious conditions in the country, as well as his experience as an organizer of conferences and campaigns, will find a wide field of opportunity.

—A CLEARING HOUSE for the Church is the latest development in Christian Association work at the University of Pennsylvania. This is a movement to prevent the student while at college from drifting away from the particular branch of the Church to which he belongs at home. The secretary of the Association brings the clergyman of the neighborhood into touch with students of like faith; the student is invited to the Sunday services. Opportunities are given him to attend the Sunday School either as a scholar or teacher. In this way many a young man who otherwise might have lost interest in religious activity is saved for the denomination to which he belonged at home. A service is conducted at the University every Sunday morning by the most noted clergymen and religious leaders in the United States. There are seventy Pennsylvania graduates on the mission field serving under various denominations. The Christian Association of the University has established in Canton, China, a mission station which includes a medical school, a hospital and a religious headquarters. Seven persons exclusive of native workers are devoting their lives to this work. The mission is supported by the gifts of the students, faculty, and friends of the University. Because of this gospel of practical religion the Christian Association has become a vital force in student life at Pennsylvania University. There is scarcely a student prominent in undergraduate affairs who is not an avowed Christian, doing active work either under the auspices of the Christian Association or in connection with some church in the vicinity of the campus.



Just Look at This

Here Are Actual Photographs—Magnified —of the Right and Wrong in Baked Beans

Here's a typical bean—crisped and worthless—from the top of the home baking dish. It is caused by dry heat. But the heat which gets to the beans below it is merely a simmering heat. It isn't half enough to make them digestible.

That's why beans are heavy food. That's why they ferment and form gas. Only these beans on the top—these beans that are burnt—ever get sufficient heat.

Here is a bean from the soggy mass at the bottom of the home baking dish. Simmered to pieces in a moderate heat. Not baked at all.

They are good to the taste, despite the fact they are mushy. But of what worth is a food which can't be digested—which cannot be turned to nutrition?

To get this dish you spend 16 hours in soaking, boiling and baking. The meal must be started the day before. The result is a food entirely unfit, save for the strongest stomach.

This splendid food—more nutritious than meat—is robbed of four-fifths of its value.

Here is a bean from a can of Van Camp's. Every bean in a can is like it.

Uncrisped and unbroken. Nut-like, mealy and whole. Luscious tomato sauce baked through and through. The flavor of pork baked in.

Yet this bean for hours has been baked in an oven heated to 245 degrees. But it was a steam oven—not a dry heat.

These beans are digestible — immensely digestible. And they are so likable—so nut-like and mealy—that you never can get your folks back to the home-baked after they once taste these.

Van Camp's beans come ready to serve. You can keep them on hand—a dozen meals at a time—ready for any emergency. They never lose their freshness or savor.

By baking beans for a million homes we bake them cheaper than you can.

This dish is our pride—our specialty—our study for fifty years. No factory, no home, no hotel has approached it. You will cut meat bills in two when you once find out how good baked beans can be.

"The National Dish" Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS "The National Dish"

In Van Camp's you get Michigan beans, picked out by hand—beans all of one size, all baked alike. You get a sauce made of vine-ripened tomatoes, costing us five times what some sauce would cost. A single comparison will prove to you how it pays to get this brand.

Three sizes: 10, 15 and 20 cents per can

The guaranteed service of a SEALY MATTRESS is 20 years.

Sound sleep and genuine rest are among the most valuable things in the world.

Continued health, bodily energy, and mental activity are largely dependent upon the restorative, recreative power of restful sleep. The best sleep insurance known is the Sealy Mattress and it costs only two cents a week. Read about this

SEALY MATTRESS

No Tufts
No Layers
No Linters

No Tufts means, instead of a series of humps and hollows, a smooth, buoyant, undulating bed that instantly conforms to every curve, every posture of the body. There is no resting on "high spots," no twisting, no cramping of the body to conform to the inequalities of the mattress.

The Sealy has no inequalities and it accommodates itself to the sleeper, instead of forcing the sleeper to accommodate himself to the mattress.

There is no other mattress like the Sealy, made without uncomfortable tufts, without flattening the cotton fibres out into sheets or layers, without the use of linters, gin-waste or shoddy.

The Sealy is made by a patented pneumatic process that leaves each cotton fibre in its natural curly, springy form; the fibres are interlocked into one giant batt the size of the mattress; no divisions whatever. By this process, and only by this process is a tuftless mattress produced that is guaranteed to give 20 years' service without becoming lumpy or bunchy. This process requires high-grade long-fibre cotton—the only thing that ever goes into a Sealy Mattress, while tufted, layer-felt mattresses are largely made of linters or gin-waste, mill-waste and shoddy.

SEALY MATTRESSES are made in all sizes, covered with the best grade of A. C. A., Bookfold Sateen, or Mercerized Art Tickings, either Plain Edge or Roll Edge—but never tufted. Prices, $20 to $25.

Send for our booklet "The Real Difference in Mattresses" and the "Mattress Museum"

Mrs Somerville's Superstition

By ARNOLD HOFMANN

"WELL, dear, I must hurry along now and catch my train," said Mr. Somerville, putting down his newspaper and arising from the breakfast table.

"Dear me!" pouted Mrs. Somerville, "haven't you time to stay at the table until I finish feeding baby his milk and crackers?" Here she turned to the two-year-old infant, sitting beside her in his high chair, and kissed him. "Poor 'itto Bartholomew! 'ur dadda never has any time for 'oo and mamma. Has he, dearie?" she chirped.

"Dadda, dadda," gurgled the baby.

"But, my dear Azalea," remonstrated Mr. Somerville, "you are a trifle unreasonable. It is imperative that I should be in town promptly at eleven o'clock this morning."

"Oh, well, I suppose it is; but what is the use of having a summer home if you have to spend all your time in town away from me?"

"Why, how can you say that, Azalea darling? You know that this is the first time that I have gone to town this week, and I wouldn't go now only we are going to have an important directors' meeting and I simply must be there. And what's more, I'll have to hurry or I'll miss my train, and they only run every two hours, you know." He glanced out of the window. "There is Williams with the auto now, waiting to take me to the station."

"Well, go ahead, Alfred dear; go ahead. I'm not preventing you. Please don't let me detain you," replied his wife.

Mr. Somerville shrugged his shoulders and slipped into his linen duster. "Don't you want to ride to the station with me, dear? It's such a beautiful morning."

"And leave poor little Bartholomew here all alone without having finished his breakfast? No, thank you. I prefer to attend to my duties."

"But the nurse can finish feeding him."

"Alfred Somerville, you know very well that I am not that kind of a mother."

Mr. Somerville gave up in despair, kissed the baby a resounding smack on his chubby cheek, received an icy osculation from his wife, and going out stepped into his car and departed.

Mrs. Somerville stood on the veranda for a few moments, watching the automobile speed down the road, and then returned to the dining-room. There the baby was clamoring to be fed, and she hastened to comply with his wishes. "Yes, dearie, 'ur mamma is tomin'."

As she passed Mr. Somerville's place at the table she cast a hasty glance at the newspaper. Something caught her eye. She snatched the paper up and examined it more closely, gave a little gasp, turned pale and rushed wildly upstairs to the telephone.

"Hello! hello! Give me the railroad station, please! Quick! What's that? Oh, goodness me! I don't know the number, and I'm in too big a hurry to look for it. You surely must know the number. Give it to me right away, please!"

After a period of waiting and squabbling she got her number.

"Hello! is this the railroad station? Well, has Mr. Somerville arrived there yet? He hasn't? Oh, goodness me! Whatever am I going to do? I do hope he hasn't met with an accident on the way. Will you do me a great favor, please?"

A grunt of assent came from the other end of the line, but Mrs. Somerville went on without waiting for that.

"As soon as Mr. Somerville reaches the station tell him to turn right around and come back with all haste. His wife has something to tell him and must see him right away."

She hung up the receiver, rushed down to her baby and fed him with nervous impatience, while her rather pretty face wore an anxious, preoccupied expression.

In the course of twenty minutes Mr. Somerville, pale, excited and covered with dust from the breakneck speed with which the auto had made the return trip, bounded into the house.

"For goodness' sake, what is it?" he cried wildly. "The man at the station told me you telephoned something terrible had happened!"

"No, dear, but I know something terrible would have happened if you had not returned immediately." Here the lady of the house struck a dramatic attitude. "Alfred Somerville," she said in a voice tense with awe and dark foreboding, "do you realize that to-day is Friday, the thirteenth?"

"Yes, yes," he replied breathlessly; "and what——?"

"It's Friday, the thirteenth," she repeated solemnly.

"Well, what about it? What did you call me back for?" he panted.

"What did I call you back for? Goodness gracious! Is not that enough?"

He retreated a step in blank astonishment. "Azalea Somerville, do you mean to say that you called me back here and caused me to miss my train for no other reason that that this is Friday, the thirteenth?"

"I do," she replied stoutly; "and what's more, I won't listen to your leaving the house this day. Don't you remember what the fortune-teller told me last winter? A great calamity would befall us in May. This is May, and what better day could you find for this terrible thing to happen than on Friday, the thirteenth?"

Even Somerville lost his patience. "Confound it!" he cried hotly; "I won't be such a fool. I won't stay. I've got to be at that meeting. You've made me miss my train now, and I'll have to go all the way in the machine. But I'm going."

"Oh, Alfred! How can you say such a thing on a day like this?" she half screamed. "And whatever you do, don't go. I feel that something terrible is going to happen. Don't tempt fate this way, Alfred dear. Oh, please stay home!"

"It's absurd and impossible. We have to consider a most important question to-day, and I've got to be there. Good-by!" he said curtly, and rushed out to his car. "Williams, drive all the way to the city, and throw on your best speed. We've got to make it by eleven o'clock," he ordered as he climbed in and slammed the door after him.

Mrs. Somerville sank down on a chair and burst into a flood of tears. Presently her younger and unmarried sister came downstairs to breakfast. "Why, what in the world is the matter, Azalea, dear?" asked that young lady on discovering the tearful one.

"Oh, Ethel! he doesn't love me any more," sobbed Mrs. Somerville. "He went away without kissing me good-by, and this is Friday, the thirteenth. Don't you remember what that woman told me? Oh, I know something dreadful is going to happen."

Miss Ethel, though a trifle worried herself, tried to comfort her sister, but Mrs. Somerville would not listen.

"Don't worry me, Ethel. I want to be alone." She rang for the nurse-girl. "Mary, finish feeding dear little Bartholomew, and then take him out on the lawn—he'll be safest out in the open—and keep a strict watch over him every minute of the time." With that she hurried up to her room, locked the door, threw herself on the bed and cried and prayed by turns.

It was not long before Mrs. Somerville's preventatives began to take

"The South Bend Watch costs from $75

—Down to What Anyone Can Afford

THE SOUTH BEND WATCH, the Master Timepiece, in a solid gold case is priced at seventy-five dollars. There is no finer watch produced. Watches can be made more extravagantly but not more stylish or more reliable.

Equally accurate South Bend Watches in less expensive cases may be had at extremely reasonable prices. So almost anyone can now afford a really high-grade watch—a South Bend Watch.

Six months are spent in the making of every South Bend Watch. Each watch is then given from a month to six months' regulation. Each is inspected 411 times. The expert jewelers who sell our watches then give each watch "personal regulation to the buyer."

Good watches run differently for different people. If you walk much, ride in motor cars, move quickly, etc., your watch is affected and should be regulated to offset these conditions.

Only a good jeweler can do this, and it can be done only with a good watch, for common watches are not sensitive enough for such delicate regulation—hence, seldom keep time for anybody.

Mrs. Somerville's Superstition

effect. While the nurse-girl and the chambermaid became deeply engrossed in a momentous discussion over the appropriateness of wearing open-work stockings with high-topped shoes, young Bartholomew tumbled into the fish-pond surrounding the fountain, and came very near terminating his career before he was discovered and rescued.

The girls became badly frightened. They immediately called a council to decide upon the best way in which to escape the wrath of the mistress. After much discussion it was resolved that Mary should take the baby to the garage and show him the gasoline tank and other amusing things while the chambermaid, on the pretense of cleaning the room, went upstairs and smuggled out a fresh change of clothing for the child. Meanwhile little Bartholomew, too badly frightened to cry, sat shivering and sputtering and turning blue with cold.

On the whole the plan worked very well. Bartholomew had several dresses of like pattern and texture, but they encountered a difficulty when it came to shoes; for with the summer season coming on, it happened that he possessed only the one pair of high-topped shoes, which he had on when he fell into the water. This was a bad thing, for Mrs. Somerville, being a careful mother, would probably notice the change in her baby's footwear and would begin asking questions.

But the girls overcame this difficulty by changing the stockings and replacing the same shoes, whereupon little Batty, as they called him, was made to trot up and down the gravel path until the shoes dried on his feet. Thus everything came out nicely and Mrs. Somerville never knew how near she had come to losing her darling child.

After lunch Mrs. Somerville calmed down somewhat and decided not to worry quite so much. She resolved to wait calmly and heroically for the calamity that she dreaded would come before the day was over.

"After all, I think you had better leave Bartholomew in my care for the rest of the day, Mary," she told the nurse-girl. "You can have the rest of the day to yourself. I'll feel easier if I keep him right with me all the time."

Mrs. Somerville amused the child in the nursery for a while, and when it came time for his nap she took him into her own room and placed him on the bed. Then hastily removing her collar and tossing it upon a low chair, she made herself comfortable and lay down beside him.

The child soon feel asleep, and the mother, worn out with worry and anxiety, was not long in following.

Two hours later she was awakened by the maid shaking her gently. "Please, madam, come down right away. They're bringing in Mr. Somerville and Williams."

Mrs. Somerville was on her feet in an instant. She swayed slightly and pressed her hand to her heart, crying, "It has come! I knew it! I knew it! O heaven, have mercy on me!"

"Please, madam, don't carry on so," pleaded the maid, "Don't look that way. They're not dead—only hurt. The auto was wrecked."

Mrs. Somerville staggered down the stairs, followed by the maid, and little Bartholomew was left alone and completely forgotten for the time being.

Mr. Somerville, a mass of bandages and bruises, was just being deposited on a comfortable chair in the living room when his wife reached the lower hall.

"O Alfred!" she gasped, falling on her knees beside him and taking his hand; "Don't tell me that you are going to die!"

"Die nothing!" he snapped. "Williams and I are all banged up, that's all. Spent half the day in a hospital and had to be brought home in a carriage."

"Oh, dear! I knew it would happen! I knew it! Why didn't you listen to me and stay home? I told you something terrible would happen to-day."

"If you had left me alone I would have got that train this morning and everything would have been all right," he retorted, sharply; "but this way we tried to make fast time and ran into a farm-wagon. The machine is a complete wreck, so is the farm-wagon, and I have to pay for it. Williams and I are badly cut and bruised, and I missed the directors' meeting, all because you got a crazy notion into your head. Now are you satisfied?"

"Alfred dear, don't talk that way," she pleaded. Then turning away, "Oh, he's out of his head. What am I going to do? Where is Miss Ethel? Tell her to come and help me."

"Her young man came by for her in his machine and they went for a ride," informed the maid.

"This too!" ejaculated Mrs. Somerville. "Now she'll be killed. Why did you let her go?"

"Miss Ethel is her own mistress, madam. I can't stop her from going out."

"Yes, I know—I know. But—"

"Look here, Azalea," Mr. Somerville broke in; "calm yourself and be sensible. I'm not seriously hurt. Be a dear girl, sit down beside me and keep me company while James gets me my dressing-gown and slippers and a cup of coffee—and one for Williams too, James."

"I'll fix the coffee myself, you poor dear," exclaimed Mrs. Somerville, and rushed out into the kitchen.

It was nearing twilight when the excitement over Mr. Somerville's accident began to abate; and now, for the first time, a faint sound of mingled coughing and crying coming from the upper regions reminded Mrs. Somerville of poor little Bartholomew, who had been left alone all this time.

She hurried upstairs and discovered the child sitting in the middle of the floor. In one chubby fist he held her discarded collar, which bore evidence of having been chewed. His other hand he had in his mouth.

"Well, mamma's precious, did dey leave 'oo all alone? Did 'oo tink 'ur mamma had runned away?" she asked.

"Hurt, mamma, hurt," whined the baby, digging his hand farther into his mouth as if trying to extract something, and thereby almost strangling himself.

"What hurts dear?" asked his mother excitedly.

The child coughed. "Hurts," he repeated and put his hand into his mouth again.

"What is it, precious? Did you swallow something?"

"Swallow," said Bartholomew. "Swallow hurts."

"Goodness gracious! What did you swallow? Let mamma see." She snatched him up and carried him to the window, where she pried open his mouth and looked down his throat. "I can't see anything. Tell mamma what you swallowed."

For answer the infant coughed and choked.

His mother's distracted gaze fell upon the damaged collar, which he still clutched tightly. "You didn't swallow my gold-headed pin, did you?" Wildly she rushed to the chair where she knew she had tossed the collar with the pin—an ordinary long straight pin with a gold head—sticking in it. She looked on the chair, the floor — everywhere. The pin was gone!

Pale and trembling, she flew at the child and shook him while she cried in a wild, trembling voice: "Speak to me, Bartholomew. Tell mamma the truth. Did you swallow the pin?"

The child became frightened and began to cry.

"Oh, don't cry—answer mamma. Did Bartholomew swallow pin?"

Business Men and the Bible

By Clayton Sedgwick Cooper

MR. EDISON has defined American genius as consisting of "two per cent. of inspiration and ninety-eight per cent. of perspiration." A man whose genius could be thus described is usually lauded as a successful member of modern society—successful because he is effective in business, or effective in competitive public enterprise requiring ingenuity and zeal, or effective in accumulation of wealth.

But the gospel of efficiency may be the means of depriving the modern business man of the very finest prizes of life, namely, contentment and the power to comprehend the real meaning of existence. Our cities are filled with men who have succeeded materially in their calling, but we search often despairingly for great leaders among business men—leaders who "see life steadily and see it whole"—who have not only gained property but perspective, who have not only succeeded in doing but in addition have made a success of being—who possess, with great estates, great souls. Many a community tolerates successful men whom it does not love or need, and whom it would quite gladly dispense with. Too often the man of high commercial rank is criticized as being of low mental and moral quality, indulging in tyranny over the weak, and fattening upon the servility and feebleness of the poor.

Business may need watchful and powerful regulations through legislative high forces. Social conditions require constant study and ever expanding plans of amelioration, but our modern society cries out for business men who stand with high and successful honor at its summit, who are capable of matching their activity with their contemplation, who know not only their particular specialism but also the God of all specialties, and the place their success should fill in his plan.

The Bible as a Force in Modern Business

One instrument through which such precious knowledge is coming among many business men of our day is the Bible. Business men are returning to the "Book our mothers read," to find in it inspiration for a new and finer idealism, to discern the world of the spirit which lies, for him who would seek it earnestly, not far from the world of the flesh.

And such men as only know the Bible of their Sunday School days are finding a new approach to the Word of God—a new attitude rising out of sensible modern scholarship and the needs of a new time. They are finding it possible to study the Bible as they would study other literature—with intelligent and scientific method, with unprejudiced mind, with the idea of finding out its truth, relative not merely to some early century but to our own times.

Adult Bible classes in the church are taking on new life. Last year the records show more than 400,000 men enrolled in Bible classes organized and unorganized in American churches. Ninety-seven thousand two hundred and eleven men were enrolled in the Bible classes of the Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States and Canada. A Bible class of business men in New York studied and discussed the Bible last winter with such topics in mind as the following:

The statesmanship of Moses as adapted to modern public life.

Amos as a reformer.

What was Jesus' attitude to money? to pleasure? to crime?

Some of the sessions of the class were trips of investigation to the poorer districts of the city. The principles of Christianity were taken not theoretically, but practically. The religion of the Bible was not a fine thing for one day in seven; it was a working theorem; a gospel leading to immediate serviceableness; a programme of vital utilitarianism; a realized idealism.

There are two distinct and sufficient reasons for the serious study of the Bible by the modern business man. First, because he cannot afford to get on without such study; and, second, because he possesses the unique ability to present and to adapt the Bible's message to men of his time.

The Bible's Message to the Business Man

We can hardly overestimate the value of the Bible to men of business in their struggles and sorrows and disappointments as an indispensable and personal help in time of trouble. Many a business man's heart will respond to the feeling in the following passage taken from Stanley's accounts of his stern conflicts in Africa:

> Constrained at the darkest hour to humbly confess that without God's aid I was helpless, I vowed a vow in the forest's solitude that I would confess his help before men. A silence as of death was around about me. In this physical and mental distress alone, I besought God to give me back my companions, whose fate was a mystery. Before turning in for the night, I resumed my reading of the Bible as usual. I had already read the book through from beginning to end, and was now in Deuteronomy for the second reading. I came to the verses wherein Moses exhorts Joshua in those fine lines, "Be strong, and of good courage; fear not, nor be afraid of them; for the Lord thy God, he it is that doth go with thee; he will not fail thee nor forsake thee." It encouraged me to go on and be confident.

The modern business man, whether a churchman or not, needs the solace of the Bible. He is subjected to a strain of body and mind and spirit which probably no other class of men experience to a like degree. He stands upon the firing line of our new and rapidly expanding material civilization. He knows the sudden disaster and calamity, the terrific risks, the clash of antagonistic interests, the unsurmountable obstacles, the treachery of alleged friends, the rapidly shifting and ominous condition of modern competitive struggle. The business man fairly sleeps in his armor. His face is carved by the lines of care and business stress. His hair is silvered before its time through the apparition of fortunes lost or won—the impact upon his spirit of the Sturm und Drang of incessant business warfare.

Is it any wonder that Lincoln turned to the Bible and read it more than any other book during the storm-tossed days of the Civil War? A friend of mine occupied a steamer chair on a recent transatlantic voyage by the side of one of our foremost men in public life. This public man was seen reading his Bible each morning. After several days had passed my friend inquired what he found of interest in the book. He replied that it was his daily habit to read it, since it helped to allay the vexations of life's busy hours; it assisted him in securing calm and balance when confusion reigned about him; it lent him patience—the power to wait. On his month's trip to Europe he had read the Psalms and the Gospel of John and the Gospel of St. Luke. He added, "It is a great book, the Bible."

A business man in one of our American cities whose moments are so valuable that one is rarely able to secure through his secretary more than a ten-minute interview, takes a half-hour each morning, in the private room which he has fitted up in his home on the top floor, for the uninterrupted reading of a Scriptural passage, and for thought thereon. He said publicly not long ago that this habit was the chief reason for any real power and success in his life.

The Bible belongs to the business man by right of his need. He needs it for dynamic and self-control. He takes

Rev. Dr. H. M. DuBose, of Au-a, Ga., said: "I have never before ized the immensity of this problem. problem is a vital one. If you ot make this country somehow ther the city of God, it will be thing very different. For the ted States of America will either he most deadly hindrance to the gdom of God or the most glorious to it, and that within a short ."

was natural that foreign mis-s should have a prominent place he programme. In his address on he Responsibility of Methodism in rld-wide Evangelism," Rev. Dr. mas H. Lewis, of Westminster, M., President of the General Confer-e of the Methodist Protestant rch, spoke the plain old-fashioned d as to the world's real need of ist. Dr. Lewis also made a power-l appeal for union of the different nches of Methodists in America. no one was this theme of Meth-t union more forcibly presented n by the Rev. Dr. Sennosuke Ogata, sident of the Anglo-Japanese Col-e in Tokyo. Doctor Ogata is a duate of De Pauw University. He ne to the Conference from Japan to present the "four-year-old child of ee mothers—unwilling to grow up ee children of three mothers." "It perplexing," said Dr. Ogata, "to ordinary Japanese mind, why re are so many denominations of Christian Church, when all Chris-s believe in the same God and the e Saviour."

Dr. J. W. Butler, of Mexico, traced growth of Methodism in that ntry since the time of the first umenical Council, when there was dly a score of Methodist congrega-s there. To-day there are 352 con-gations, with 7,401 children in day ools and 10,198 in Sunday Schools. The fact that women delegates have n seated with their men associates n the floor of the Conference has n a source of gratification to many. ng and fierce has been the fight de by Methodist women for admis-n to the various conferences of ir church.

The presiding officer of the women's sion in Toronto was Mrs. William I. ven, President of the New York anch of the Women's Foreign Mis-nary Society. To Mrs. George O. binson of Detroit belongs the dis-ction of being the first woman to t her voice in the Conference. hat women have done in Methodism s discussed at a mass meeting held connection with the Conference. rs. Thomas R. Ferens of London d of the businesslike administra-n of women's missionary work. e work of a deaconess was explained Mrs. Lucy Rider Meyer, Principal the Chicago Training School for issions and pioneer in deaconess rk in the United States. Mrs. Joseph Johnson of the Primitive Methodist Church, Honorary Secretary of the Sisters' Settlement and Training Home in London and of the Cripples' and Poor Children's Seaside Home at Westcliff-on-Sea, spoke of the work of mothers, concluding her remarks with the words, "Who made King Edward the Peacemaker if not Victoria the Good?"

Of course Peace occupied an important part in the discussions, seeming to be ever present in the minds of the speakers whatever the appointed topic might be. There was no sentiment more heartily cheered than allusions made by Bishop Hoss to the amicable relations existing between the British Empire and the world's greatest Republic.

Sir Robert Perks, who has won renown on both sides of the Atlantic both as a practical man of business and an equally alert churchman, added his plea for peace. "We are anxious to use the forces of our Church to further this great arbitration business so that something practical can be done in the direction of stopping the wicked outlay upon war. We have upon the throne of the Empire to-day a king who in the love of the British home, and in his devotion to the interests of the Empire and the inheritance of his father's love of peace will, I believe, by the grace of God, be able to guide its destinies through its most troublous days."

Another Englishman of distinction to receive warm welcome was the Rev. Owen S. Watkins of London, ranking chaplain of the British Army and Chaplain of the Household Troops of His Majesty George V. As a veteran of the Soudan and the siege of Ladysmith, and as one of the chaplains who conducted the memorial service of Chinese Gordon after the fall of Khartoum, as one who was mentioned in special despatches to Queen Victoria for service on the field, receiving several medals, Mr. Watkins is a person to command respect.

It is a far cry from military chaplains to Indian chiefs, yet among the duly accredited delegates were Rev. H. L. Cloud, representing the Cherokee Indians, and Moty Tiger, chief of the Creek Indians, both from Oklahoma. Mr. Cloud made a short and earnest address. Moty Tiger was introduced by Bishop Hoss, who said: "He is the present chief, and will be the last chief, of the Muskogee Indians, the very tribe to which John Wesley went in Georgia. Wesley went back imagining that his work had been a failure. But nearly that whole tribe is now Methodist."

It would be impossible to rehearse all the good things said and done at the Ecumenical Conference. The meetings closed with a weighty feeling of responsibility resting upon the minds of those who had attended the sessions.

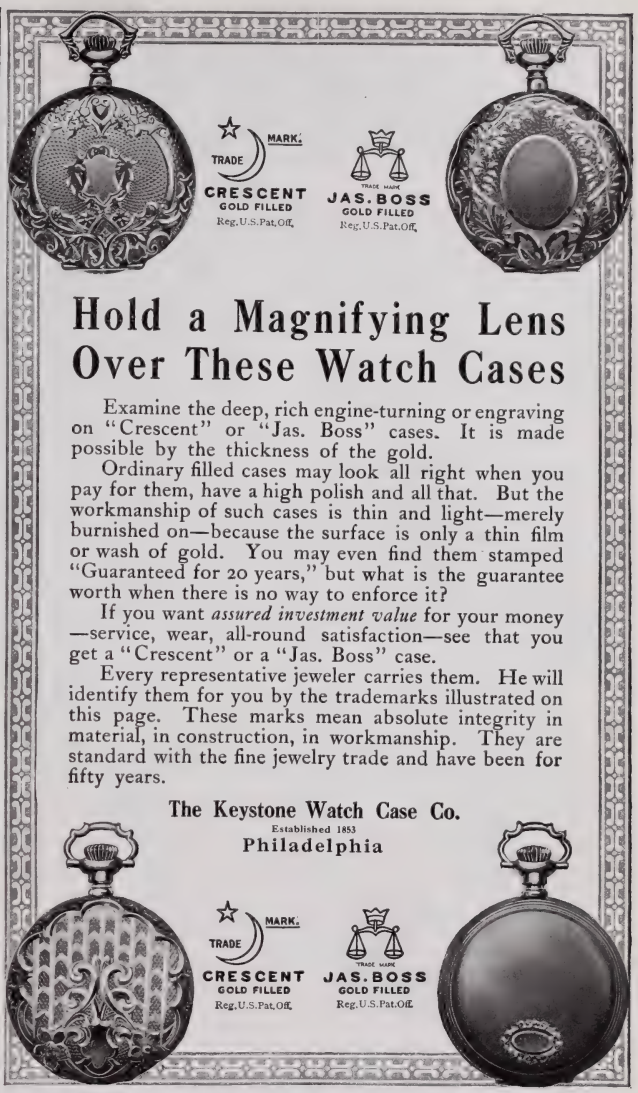
China in the Throes of Civil War



THE revolution which has been hanging over China for months past, and of which the rising in e province of Sze-Chuen was only a all part, has begun in earnest. It is concerted movement to take the em-re and declare a republic. The noted iled revolutionist, Dr. Sun Yat Sen, ader of the anti-Manchu party, if the ans do not miscarry, is to be elected esident.

Sun Yu, a brother of Dr. Sun Yat en, who is now in Hankow, has been ected president of the Provincial ssembly, and Tang Hua Lung, the tiring president of the Assembly and well-known scholar, has been elected overnor of Hu-Peh.

The rebels are well organized and nancially strong. They have con-cated the local treasuries and banks d are issuing their own paper money, deeming the government notes with his, as the foreign banks are refusing e government notes.

The revolutionaries who captured Wu-Chang have crossed the Yang-Tse River and occupied the native section —comprising the whole city except the foreign concessions of Hankow and Han-Yang. Chang-Sha, capital of Hu-Nan, is reported to have risen in revolt, and Nanking, capital of the province of Kiang-Su, is on the verge of a rising, several public buildings having been destroyed, including the yamens of the Viceroy and the Tartar general. The business and foreign relations part of the movement are being carried on in a most thorough and statesmanlike manner.

The Chinese Government has awakened to the danger of the revolution in Hu-Peh Province. An imperial edict ordered the immediate dispatch of two divisions of troops to the disaffected provinces. About 20,000 of the troops are Manchus. Five out of ten of the divisions of China's modern army are reported to have joined the revolution.

Mortgages on Real Estate

TO succeed, the investor must ever keep in mind certain basic principles, which are as essential to success as the Arabic numerals are to the schoolboy's arithmetic. We shall therefore offer no excuse for repeating the five elementary requirements of a good investment. These are: first, safety of principal and interest; second, rate of income; third, convertibility; fourth, prospect of increase in market value; fifth, stability of market price. In no line of investment is it more essential to keep those points in mind than in that form known as real estate mortgages.

What a Mortgage Is

A real estate mortgage is usually known as a "bond and mortgage." It consists of two parts: first, a note or promise to pay, called "the bond," and, second, the security or lien upon the real estate. The first agrees to pay at some future date a fixed sum of money at a legal rate of interest, agreed on at time of contract. The contract, fully stated in the mortgage, sets forth that the transfer shall be void if the interest is duly met and the bond or note redeemed at time of maturity.

These preliminaries are clear and simple, but they are the essentials to a transaction necessarily more complex than that of buying a railroad or other corporate bond. Before advancing money on the security of a real estate mortgage, the business man knows, and the novice should know, that it is necessary to find out: first, that the title to the property is legally vested in the maker of the mortgage; second, that the maker of the mortgage is of legal age and sound understanding; third, that during the life of the mortgage the taxes and insurance will be duly met; and fourth, that all other liens and claims against the property shall be fully and clearly set forth.

Safety of Such Security

In buying a real estate mortgage, the five essential points before set forth should be kept in mind. In common with all other forms of security, the safety of a real estate mortgage depends on the margin of security in excess of the amount loaned. This can be approximated in the case of real estate with more accuracy than in the usual corporate bond. In large cities expert appraisers can be depended on to make such an estimate, and in the smaller places, the lawyers who prepare the papers and search the records for title and previous liens should have a good knowledge of real estate values in their own neighborhood. While such an examination may show that the property is worth at the time twice the amount for which it is pledged, unless it satisfies another condition the investment may not be safe, and that is permanency of selling value.

If the value of the property, on which a mortgage is held, advances, it follows that the security of the loan is increased, but this fact does not add in any way to the value of the principal invested, as would be the case with industrial, railroad, or public-utility bonds. If the value of the mortgaged property decreases, and particularly where the impairment is very great, the holder is often compelled in self-defense to take over the property.

While real estate mortgages may be and often are transferred to banks as security for loans, one of their most prominent characteristics is their lack of convertibility, and this may be regarded as their chief disadvantage. On the other hand, this quality removes them from the field of active speculation, and so they cannot shrink in value, as do more readily convertible forms of security.

The following, in brief, may be regarded as the peculiar qualities of a real estate mortgage. First, when purchased under the best conditions, it affords ample security for principal and interest; second, it gives a relatively high return; third, it has a low convertibility; fourth, it has no prospect of increase in value; fifth, it affords the greatest security for keeping intact the amount invested.

Who Should Invest

We have repeatedly called attention to the wisdom of investing judiciously any business surplus, and we have pointed out that the first requisite of such an investment should be convertibility, so as to be able readily to meet any unexpected call for cash. Now, as real estate mortgages are not readily convertible, it follows that they should not be seriously considered when it comes to the investment of a business surplus, though, like all the rules governing such matters, there may be exceptions.

When it comes to individual or private investment, it is not so easy to decide between real estate mortgages and other forms of security, so much depends on the status of the investor. If there is any considerable sum of money available, the best course certainly would be not to put too much of it into this form of investment, but when the sum is not large, the real estate mortgage has its advantages and its attractions.

Guaranteed Real Estate Mortgages

A discussion of this subject, no matter how cursory, would lack an essential if no reference were made to what has come to be known as "guaranteed mortgages." These are generally issued by large corporations, which issue what may be described as, though they are not so called, combination mortgages. The companies buy, let us suppose, a mortgage for $100,000 on approved real estate for which they receive five per cent. They divide this into 1,000 shares of $100 each, and sell the bonds at four and one-half per cent., keeping one-half of one per cent. for expenses and profit. If the mortgaged property should decline in value till it is lower than the amount advanced the company has its surplus to fall back on, and the investor at least is secure.

The returns from this source are never so great as when the transaction between borrower and lender is direct, but such an investment saves a world of worry, while affording ample security. As these companies are nearly all of comparatively recent formation, they have had the advantage of a general rise in real estate values and so have prospered greatly. This prosperity, as is ever the case, has led to the formation of similar companies all over the country. Many of these new companies may be entirely safe, but prudence will lead to their examination before the cautious investor entrusts his money to their keeping.

An Immigration Problem

—MISS MARY E. BAMFORD, corresponding secretary of the Woman's Baptist Missionary Society of Northern California, writing of the work of Miss C. I. E. Pierson amongst the immigrants of Angel Island, San Francisco, says: "One of the saddest parts of immigration work is always, of course, deportation, and it seems especially sad in the cases of the deported Chinese women, who are sent back to China, for the missionary knows that these women will soon be met at Hong-Kong by the slave dealers who sent them to America, and who will drag them straight back into the old, dreadful life. Miss Pierson has tried in vain to find any one at Hong-Kong who will meet and save these women from the slave dealers. If there is any reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who has a friend or acquaintance in Hong-Kong, let him write to such friend there, asking if some provision cannot be made at Hong-Kong to save these poor deported Chinese women from the clutches of the slave dealers there."

Permanent and Indestructible

The security for your investment should be easy to find, permanent in its location, and of a quality that is indestructible. The First Mortgage Farm Loan is one of the very few investments which can qualify under such conditions.

The security back of a Farm Mortgage has a value aside from its tangible worth, in that the farmer has a sentimental as well as a financial interest in the land. This interest is shared by his whole family, as it is their home and must be protected at any cost.

The farmer is entitled to help in financing his operations and we have had the privilege, during the last 33 years, of helping hundreds of farmers acquire an independence. On the other hand, we have supplied an equal number of investors with a first class investment. We can supply you with a mortgage at 6% interest, secured by a first class farm, with a good farmer back of it. *Our booklet "A" describes such mortgages and will be sent free upon request. Joshua's "Long Day"

A Soldier's View of the Famous Battle When the Sun and Moon Stood Still

In a recent issue, on the "questions and answers" page, you explained to V. H. F., Sycamore, Fla., that, according to the views of some commentators, Joshua's command to the sun and moon to stand still is not to be taken literally; also that Joshua's prayer was that they should withhold their light and that the gloom or semi-darkness should last until the battle was fought—or words to that effect.

The truth is the commentaries are wrong. The sun and moon stood still literally. This has been verified by all eclipses. When the eclipses are verified from the beginning of creation—or Adamic time—it brings us down to Tuesday of the week; and when we verify the eclipses from the present time backward to Joshua's long day, it brings us to Wednesday of the week. And, when the calculation is worked out by the ninths of time instead of seconds, we find that the sun halted not to go down for about a whole day, i. e., twenty-three and one-third hours. If you will consult Isaiah 28: 7-9 you will see how the calendar was corrected; this account is also known in the books of Kings and Chronicles, thus proving the facts to be true.

As to the theory that darkness was necessary in order to enable Joshua to win out over his enemies, no greater mistake was ever made. I speak now from a military standpoint. Every military operation is a problem in geometry, which is the science of angles—troops opposing each other always form some kind of an angle—and the general who is best posted upon that subject is sure to win out. If both are well posted, then it becomes a question of strength and tactical skill. Joshua's operations show that his forces were at least equal to those of his enemies, or else he could not have attempted a combined front and flank movement. His advance was at Gibeon and the main body at Gilgal; and the account in Joshua 10) says that he went up from Gilgal all night, and went into position on the right and rear of the enemy's lines. He might have gone to the other flank, but this would have had the effect of driving the enemy into their own stronghold. By gaining the enemy's right and rear, he forced them to retreat away from their base.

If a general, through his scouts, learns that the enemy is equal or inferior in numbers he will attack as soon as it is light enough to see; if the enemy is superior he will either retreat or delay the action as long as possible, because only a few hours are necessary in order to enable him to estimate the possible result. If he should be compelled to lose heavily in order to hold his own until darkness gets in—which always puts an end to a battle—he can either retreat under cover of darkness, or bring up fresh troops under cover of darkness.

Here is where the situation appealed to Joshua; he wished to win a decisive victory; he knew that darkness would be of great help to the enemy for the reasons I have given; therefore he needed a further extension of daylight, which was granted in order to enable him to win a decisive victory, and also to enable him to take up a central position in Palestine so as to conquer it from the centre outward. This was afterward carried out, as you will see by studying the rest of Joshua's operations.

Strategy is the same now as it was in Joshua's time. Tactics have changed through improvements in arms and weapons of war. Strategy is purely mathematical and deals with the handling of troops on a theatre of war, or theatre of operations. Tactics is the art of handling troops in battle or in the face of the enemy. Strategy ends when tactics begin. In Joshua's time strategy ended as soon as the opposing forces came within reach of each other with the sword and spear, or with bows and arrows, and so forth.

In these days, strategy ends as soon as the opposing forces come within striking distance of the long range repeater, or artillery; but strategy itself is the same now as it was in the days of Joshua and long before his time. The Bible is full of military science. It crops out here and there, and its principles are of as much force to-day as in the time they were written.

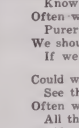
fund will be called by his name. Accompanying the money was a portrait of young Arthur Hearn by Alfonse Jongers, one of the "Maine Coast" by Winslow Homer, "Woods Island Light" by the same artist, "The Harrower" by Horatio Walker, and a very beautiful canvas by George Innes named "Spring Blossoms." Mr. Hearn in his letter of gift says the money is to be used for "the encouragement of the art of painting in this country," and empowers the authorities of the Museum to sell or exchange any of the works of art purchased with the money from the fund. The exchange is to be made for other paintings by citizens of the United States, or the proceeds to be used for that purpose.

Until having seen only the recent acquisitions one comes away with a feeling of bewilderment at a world so full of beauty, and a resolve to return as soon as possible to spend a longer day amid the wonders of this treasure-house of the Western world.

JANET PORTER.

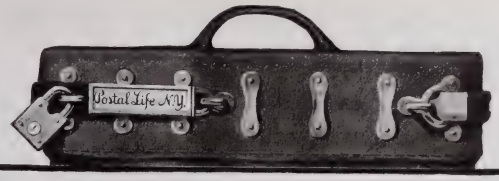
IF WE ONLY UNDERSTOOD



IF WE knew the cares and trials,
Knew the efforts all in vain,
And the bitter disappointment,
Understood the loss and gain—
Would the grim eternal roughness
Seem—I wonder—just the same?
Should we help where now we hinder?
Should we pity where we blame?

Ah! we judge each other harshly,
Knowing not life's hidden force:
Knowing not the fount of action
Is less turbid at its source;
Seeing not amid the evil
All the golden grains of good;
And we'd love each other better
If we only understood.

Could we judge all deeds by motives
That surround each other's lives,
See the naked heart and spirit,
Know what spur the action gives,
Often we should find it better,
Purer than we judge we should,
We should love each other better
If we only understood.



Could we judge all deeds by motives,
See the good and bad within,
Often we should love the sinner
All the while we loathe the sin;
Could we know the powers working
To overthrow integrity,
We should judge each other's errors
With more patient charity.

If Your Food Fails to Sustain You, Change.

One sort of diet may make a person despondent, depressed and blue and a change to the kind of food the body demands will change the whole thing.

A young woman from Phila. says:

"For several years I kept in a run-down, miserable sort of condition, was depressed and apprehensive of trouble. I lost flesh in a distressing way and seemed in a perpetual sort of dreamy nightmare. No one serious disease showed, but the 'all-over' sickness was enough.

"Finally, between the doctor and father, I was put on Grape-Nuts and cream, as it was decided I must have nourishing food that the body could make use of.

"The wonderful change that came over me was not, like Jonah's gourd, the growth of a single night, and yet it came with a rapidity that astonished me.

"During the first week I gained in weight, my spirits improved, and the world began to look brighter and more worth while.

"And this has continued steadily, till now, after the use of Grape-Nuts for only a few weeks, I am perfectly well, feel splendidly, take a lively interest in everything, and am a changed person in every way." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

"Bat swallow pin," mumbled the baby, and coughed violently until he grew red in the face.

Mrs. Somerville gave one unearthly scream, that brought every one, including the injured victims, rushing pell-mell up the stairs.

"Baby has swallowed a pin!" cried the frantic mother. "Alfred, you know that long gold-headed pin I sometimes use to pin my collar with? Baby has swallowed it."

Somerville groaned, but the next instant a gleam of hope passed over his face. "Are you sure, dear?" he asked. "Maybe it's only lost." With that all hands got down on their knees and began searching the floor.

"Of course I am sure," she replied tearfully. "He told me so, and besides, I can't find the pin anywhere."

At this juncture little Bartholomew dragged at his mouth and went off into another coughing spell, which convinced all doubting Thomases, and every one got up from the floor and asked each other what was to be done.

"Get a doctor," some one suggested; and Mrs. Somerville was at the telephone in a flash. While she was occupied there Mr. Somerville, forgetting his own injuries, turned on the light and looked down the child's throat. "Yes, I think I see it," he exclaimed. "Just the top of the gold head."

The maid took her turn at inspecting and delivered a like verdict. She could see the pin. Suggestions for removing it were offered.

"Hit him on the back," said the maid. This was tried and proved unsuccessful in dislodging the pin.

"Get a button-hook," suggested James.

"Tickle his throat with a feather and make him cough it up," advised Williams. This was undoubtedly a brilliant idea, and Mr. Somerville immediately tore a feather from one of his wife's hats and performed the operation. It worked admirably. Everything came up except the pin.

Mrs. Somerville staggered back into the room. "There is only one doctor in the village, and he is out on another case," she cried with an agonized sob of despair.

"Don't lose all hope!" cried Williams with a sudden inspiration. "I'll see what I can do." And he hobbled out of the room and down stairs with all possible speed.

Mr. Somerville gulped hard and tried to comfort his wife. "Don't lose courage, Azalea, dear. Be brave. The child isn't having much difficulty in breathing. I'll call up Dr. Hall, the eminent throat specialist, and tell him to come right out. With a fast car he can make it in an hour and a half. The child will hold out that long."

"Try your best, dear, but there isn't much use. We are doomed!" said Mrs. Somerville as she seated herself gloomily on the side of the bed and began stroking her baby's head, while the tears streamed down her cheeks.

"Hurt, mamma, hurt," the infant kept saying over and over in a pathetic little way.

While Mr. Somerville was busy at the telephone, Miss Ethel came into the room, radiant and smiling, her hat and veil still on, her gloves in her hand. "Congratulations are in order, Azalea," she beamed, "Jack and I are engaged. We went on the longest ride and—"

"Are you mad, Ethel?" interrupted Mrs. Somerville. "How can you be so frivolous in the presence of death!"

Miss Ethel started and turned pale. "What is it?" she gasped.

Mrs. Somerville, after several unsuccessful attempts at speech, finally stammered out: "Bartholomew swallowed a pin. We can't get it out. He is dying slowly."

The youngest Somerville corroborated her statement by clawing the air, coughing until he grew purple in the face, and then drawing in his breath with a sonorous wheeze.

Miss Ethel shuddered violently. Bursting into tears, she drew her veil up as far as her nose and proceeded to smother child and mother with kisses and endearing names.

At this moment, Williams rushed into the room, dragging with him a broad-shouldered, tow-headed young fellow. "Here, madam," panted Williams, "this man works in Schmidt's bakery and is a medical student. He'll yank that pin out all right. Don't you worry any more, madam."

The young student, nervous and greatly confused, felt that this was the "crowded hour" of his life. If he saved the child his reputation would be made even long before he had finished school. He drew several instruments from a small satchel, took off his coat, and bravely attacked the infant.

"It's funny that I can't get hold of it," he muttered every now and then, redoubling his efforts and growing more and more nervous.

When Mr. Somerville returned to the room, he watched the conflict for a while and then interfered. "Give the child a chance at least," he said with a restraining hand on the student's arm. "If you let him alone he may hold out until Dr. Hall comes."

The child lay tranquil now. The student departed mournfully. Miss Ethel, her hat and coat still on, sat with her arms entwining her sister. The other occupants of the room stood by silently—motionless as under a weird, gloomy spell. Thus they waited for the long minutes to drag by.

At last Dr. Hall, in evening clothes, but covered from head to foot with dust and grime, stepped into the room. Mr. Somerville explained hurriedly about the pin and the means unsuccessfully tried in attempting to dislodge it, and also told about the medical student.

The eminent specialist examined the child carefully. When he had thoroughly satisfied himself he turned to Somerville and asked stiffly: "What caused you to surmise that the child had a pin sticking in his throat?"

"Why, he told us so himself, and the pin is nowhere to be found," said Mr. Somerville and his wife in one breath.

The great doctor smiled sweetly. "Your child has a bad cold, Mr. Somerville, and his throat is inflamed and swollen. Moreover, the condition of the throat has been greatly aggravated by the barbarous means you have resorted to in attempting to extract an imaginary pin. If the child swallowed a pin at all, it is down in his stomach."

"In his stomach!" cried Mrs. Somerville hopelessly. "Gracious! that's almost as bad as having it in his throat, for it was a long straight pin with a gold head, which I sometimes used to pin my collars on with."

"What! That pin?" ejaculated Miss Ethel. "Why, I used it to pin up my veil with. It came in so nice and handy. I found it on the chair when I came into the room to tell you I was going out. You were sleeping, so I didn't disturb you." With that she drew out and displayed the luckless pin.

"Mr. Somerville, this will cost you five hundred dollars!" snapped Dr. Hall, turning on his heel and stamping out angrily.

"My dear Azalea," said Mr. Somerville a week later when the morning mail brought Dr. Hall's bill, "there are two ways of saving one's self from being run over by an express train. One way is to walk quietly along the embankment and mind one's own business, and the other is to jump into the middle of the track and try to outdistance the engine."

The tears came to Mrs. Somerville's eyes. "Oh, I'll never be superstitious any more. I was foolish; but you forgive and still love me, don't you, Alfred dear?"

With a genial laugh, he kissed her.

Every Life a Plan of God*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

OF ALL women Queen Esther is the most honored among the Jews, and this has been the case for almost twenty centuries. During all of this time, year by year, the Feast of Purim has been observed (about March 15), in which she is honored as the great deliverer of her nation. We should read the whole book of Esther (it will not take longer than half an hour to do it) to get a grasp of the situation. Search for the name of God as you read it, but you will not find it, for the word "God" does not occur in the book, in letters, but the deeds recorded in the book spell the name of Divine Providence with unmistakable clearness. It is said that a mediæval architect, forbidden to cut his name on a great cathedral he was building, so shaped the pillars and arches and windows that the very cathedral formed his name. The book of Esther is a cathedral whose whole story spells out the name of God, teaching of Providence, Promises, and Prayer as the secret springs of heroic self-sacrifice.

Esther was indeed beautiful, but that is not why she is honored. Esther was the queen of a king who ruled one hundred and twenty-seven provinces, but that is not why she is honored. It is because she soared above all others in the point of self-sacrifice for the good of her people, to save them from extermination. The dies irae had been appointed by one Haman, the king's prime minister, because he did not think himself sufficiently honored by the Jews, particularly by Mordecai. Haman's scheme included the killing of all the Jews in Persia on one day! Haman had used the king's seal in making the proclamation. The Jews thus placed under ban were for the most part the descendants of those who had chosen not to join those returning from captivity to Jerusalem to rebuild the temple nearly seventy years before.

"Who knoweth whether thou art not come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" This was the message of encouragement which Mordecai sent to Queen Esther, begging her to go in before the king and intercede for her people. She replied that death was the penalty for any one who should go uninvited into the presence of the king, unless the king should show mercy by holding out his golden sceptre.

"Gather all of the Jews together to fast and to pray for three days, that God will make the heart of the king kind, and so will I and my maidens fast and pray, and then I will go in before the king, and if I perish, I perish." She put on her most beautiful garments, and stood just outside, where the king could see her, and with joy she saw him extend his golden sceptre, inviting her to come in before him. She did not tell him then and there what was in her thoughts, but she invited the king to come to a feast, to which she also invited Haman. They came, and it was there she told the king of the wicked plot to kill her and all her people on one certain day. The king had not known about it, and when he asked who was the man that had dared to say such a thing should be done, Queen Esther pointed to Haman, and said, "He is the man!" Then the king commanded that Haman should be put to death. Then the king made a law permitting the Jews to defend themselves, and so the Jews were not exterminated (Esther, chapter 9). Queen Esther had saved her people; therefore is she honored above all women by the Jews, and to the end of time they will not forget her. Her name Esther means "a star." She is truly the star of Jewish womanhood.

At the Feast of Purim, which commemorates the deliverance of the Jews through the intervention of Esther, the book of Esther is read aloud in the synagogues, and when Haman's name occurs, "Yimach Shemo!" is shouted out, which means "Let his name be cursed." And when the name of Esther is read they shout "Boncah Esther!" "Blessed be Esther."

Women in God's Plan

It is not unusual to see a woman's own family rise up and call her blessed, but it is rather unusual to see a woman thus honored by the whole world. Recently we came across a list of such women, whose names have been placed in the Lady Chapel in the Liverpool Cathedral. It contains the names of many who have by the beauty, truth, purity and devotedness of their lives made their names household words.

Mary Collet and all prayerful women.

Louise Stewart and all the noble army of martyrs.

Christina Rossetti and all sweet singers.

Grace Darling and all courageous maidens.

Catherine Gladstone and all loyal-hearted wives.

Dr. Alice Marvel and all who laid down their lives for their sisters.

Elizabeth Barrett Browning and all who have seen the infinite in things.

Josephine Butler and all brave champions of purity.

Anna Hinderer and all missionary pioneers.

Angela Burdett Coutts, and all almoners of the King of Heaven.

Margaret Godolphin and all women who have kept themselves unspotted from the world.

Mother Cecile and all women loving and large hearted in counsel.

Elizabeth Fry and all pitiful women.

Agnes Jones and all devoted nurses.

Queen Victoria and all noble-minded queens.

Lady Margaret Beaufort and all patronesses of sacred learning.

Mary Rogers and all faithful servants.

Anne Clough and all true teachers.

Mary Somerville and all earnest students.

Susannah Wesley and all devoted mothers.

It must appear that from the time of Esther even down to the present women have had their share in making this a better world.

The speaker at a young lady's meeting began her address by saying: "It used to be that when a stranger young lady was introduced, the question was asked: 'Is she a good girl?' but now the question is asked, 'What is she good for?' It is said that when Harriet Martineau visited the United States in 1840, she found but seven employments open to women: teaching, needlework, keeping boarders, working in cotton mills, type-setting, work in bookbinders, and household service. The late Hon. Carroll D. Wright, when he was United States Commissioner of Labor, said: "To-day it would be impossible to name the number of openings in every phase of remunerative employment which women can enter." He also said: "The latest report of the United States Commissioner of Education shows that there are 228 colleges of liberal arts and 198 institutions for higher education open to women." Since then, the number has largely increased. In all parts of the world our population is, in the vast majority of cases, the result of non-employment.

In the Bowery, the proportion of such cases is so large as to be almost universal. Whatever the Bowery may have been in former times, however glaring its dissipation, its chief characteristic to-day is that it is the abode of absolutely destitute men. Poverty, grim and ghastly, with all its accompaniments of dirt, disease, degradation, and despair, rests like a black shadow upon all.

We are face to face with a winter that is likely to bring more bona fide unemployed men to the meetings, to the Bread Line, and to the Labor Bureau, than ever before. They will be, in a large proportion, men of the unskilled class. These are the men who suffer the most from the pressure of immigration, and on whose behalf the United States Immigration Commission recommended a certain degree of immigration restriction. They are the Mission's chief charge and responsibility.

A visitor to the Labor Bureau any day will find the staff busily at work registering such men. He will see scores of men perfectly well qualified physically to do an honest day's work, but, unfortunately for them, they are masters of no particular trade. Even well-intentioned farmers, Christian men, readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, require experienced men. It is therefore a matter of satisfaction to us that we have been able to secure positions for so large a proportion as about sixty-two per cent. of the men who have registered in our Bureau.

The Labor Settlement opened in the Bronx in May last has passed quite successfully through its experimental stages. It has enabled us to provide temporary work for many men whilst they have been waiting for permanent jobs. It has almost become self-supporting. We are planning the establishment of several light industries in which our unskilled brethren can be temporarily engaged, and it is our hope that we may make a beginning in a scheme that shall provide for their training along special lines of labor.

Nine out of every ten men that come to the Bowery Mission are absolutely penniless. In most cases they are suffering unspeakable hardships. Hence the Bread Line is as great a necessity as ever. It will open as usual at one o'clock on Thanksgiving morning, with a breakfast of coffee and rolls for one thousand homeless men, and this will be continued every morning at the same hour until Easter Sunday morning of 1912.

At Thanksgiving and Christmas times we shall follow the course of other years in providing dinners for the poorest families on the East Side that we can find. With all the generosity that flows out from American hearts at these festive times, the appalling needs of the families in our teeming tenements are never fully covered. Our plan is not only to go to those who need us, but to those who need us most. These can only be found by a painstaking search, and many anxious hours are spent every year by our agents in their visits to poverty-stricken homes. Every year we are made to feel regret that some must be excluded.

During the winter months the Mission will be visited by most of the prominent clergymen and laymen, amongst them prominent statesmen and lecturers, who will minister to the spiritual and intellectual needs of the men.

Mr. Frederick Townsend Martin in his most laudable efforts to bridge the chasm between the very rich and the very poor intends to make the Bowery Mission one of the principal centres of his operations. He has been spending the summer in Europe, and has done much good philanthropic work, both in the large cities and away up in the rural districts of the highlands of Scotland. He has kept himself closely in touch with the Mission and it is expected that much good will be accomplished through his kind and enthusiastic co-operation.

A Wonderful Well

FROM Rev. D. A. Randal's Egypt, Sinai, and the Holy Land, we learn that the Sultan Yoosef (Joseph), about the year 1711, in clearing away a place for the foundation of a citadel in Grand Cairo, Egypt, discovered a wonderful well. It had been dug by the ancients, when, none can tell, and was filled with sand and rubbish. It is cut in the solid rock to the depth of two hundred and sixty feet. At the mouth it is forty-five feet wide. Around the well is a winding stairway, cut also in the rock, with a partition wall of rock left, two or three feet thick, between it and the well, with occasional holes for windows to look through into the main shaft. One of the curious things of the well is the manner of elevating the water. An ox is taken down this winding stairway, to near the bottom of the well, where a large cog-wheel machine is situated for raising the water. The food is taken down to him, and he is kept there from year to year. Here, deep in these lower regions, in darkness and solitude, the patient beast travels round and round his narrow circuit turning the creaking machinery, and putting in motion the long belt of earthen jars, by means of which the water is elevated for the use of man, thus spending his life far more usefully than many a more intelligent being who enjoys the cheerful regions of light and sunshine. Your Investment Problem

Essential factors to be considered when making investments are

SECURITY AND INCOME

The question of income should never be considered apart from the security of the investment. The object of the conservative investor should be to place his funds where they will obtain the largest interest yield consistent with safety.

High grade public utility bonds, such as are offered by reputable bond houses, form a class of securities combining attractive income yield with exceptionally strong security. They are secured by mortgages on tangible property, with large equities over and above the bonded indebtedness, which equities steadily increase with the growth of the properties. It has always been the policy of this house to establish thoroughly the value of the security back of each issue before it purchases the bonds for its own account, or offers them to the public.

For many years this house has recommended and sold securities, and dur that time there has never been one d delay in the payment of principal interest on any bonds that it has brou out. It deals in high grade investme only.

This house has constantly applied the full protection of its clients as v as of itself, the wide experience judgment of its officers, not only in purchase and sale of the bonds it offe but in the consideration of other securi upon which its clients may desire adv

it for calm and unfaltering trust while he walks often in the midst of his vast adventures: he takes it for good cheer and unquenchable hope: he takes it for songs in the night in his defeat and grief; he takes it for assurance that God always cares for his sons in the manly brave fightings. Many a business man is coming from the Book of Power to-day with the Psalmist's words on his lips:

> I had fainted, unless I had believed to see the goodness of Jehovah in the land of the living.

The New Bible Revival

These sensible business men are the heralds of the new Bible revival. They will never be satisfied with an "after office hours" religion. They will be more and more insistent to read their Bible for themselves in the light of their own convictions born of experience. They will never believe that external restraints and legislative exactions will bring in the kingdom of God. "The words that I speak unto you are spirit and life," said the Master. They are learning from the New Testament itself that, as Sabatier said, Jesus did not describe himself as a philosopher but as a physician. They are learning that the field is the world, that the good seed is the children of the kingdom, and, like all good seed, is characterized by growth, productiveness and vitality.

It is the fascinating, strategic task of business men to bring the Bible into touch with life itself; to first find its message themselves, and think it through in its application to practice, then to go forth, not simply to the house of prayer, but to the house of business, where await the multitudes ready to sit at the feet of any one who has really seen the Father and "tasted of the powers of the world to come."

And when the business man becomes thoroughly aroused to the Bible and its message to business, industrial, and social life, he will realize what Jesus meant by saying "for their sakes I sanctify myself." In bringing the light of the Gospel message to his time he will find it flooding his own heart, as Dr. Francis Peabody has beautifully expressed the message of the Bible to society:

"One who embarks on the current of Bible story floats down through political changes, national problems, social reforms, the sins and repentance of Israel, the needs and hopes of the Gentile world, until at last the stream deepens and broadens, until the traveler sees before him the distant spires of the City of God, rising beyond the frontier of the perfect social world."

Such vision splendid is the crowning objective of the message of the Bible to the business man.

Sunday School Lesson

woman's horizon in those directions is being extended.

Men and Boys in God's Plan

But this lesson is not for girls and women alone, but for men and boys as well, for at least two reasons:

First, because men and boys are the fathers, husbands, brothers and sons of women, and they should think much about what God expects women to do, so that they can be helpers.

Second, because "Thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this" has been said of some boys and men in the Bible, as well as of Esther. For example, Joseph, who by being a slave in Egypt became the ruler throughout the land, and by building storehouses saved the people from death by famine. Then there was Moses, the Hebrew child hidden in the bulrushes by his mother, and so kept in safety that he might grow up to be the great lawgiver, not only to the Jews, but to the whole world. Let none of us forget that God has sent us into this world because he has something for us to do, and let us do it!

You'll Save Money, Trouble and Later Disappointment, if You Always Buy Stoves at Home

Smokeburn-Garland
Heater for Coal, Coke or Wood

If you expected to break up housekeeping and go to boarding in a few years, it might pay you to send away from home for a stove. But as you are going to need stoves the rest of your life, why not buy good stoves—stoves that last many years? Is it not poor business judgment to buy stoves that last but a third as long as they ought to, just to save a dollar or so at the start?

Home Dealers Give Better Values

In return for the slightly higher price you may pay for stoves bought at home, you get this:

1—A stove that far outwears any ordinary stove.
2—A stove that burns less fuel.
3—A stove on which the freight is paid.
4—A stove which is guaranteed to give permanent satisfaction.
5—You have no waiting to do. No squabbles to adjust with the Railroad Company. No draying. No loading. No unloading. No uncrating. No fussing with stovepipes. No blacking to fool with.
6—You get more liberal credit accommodations.

Disadvantages of Sending Away

Stoves bought away from home, though sold on 30 days' free trial, are hard to return; troublesome to crate and to haul to the station. You pay a higher freight rate than your local dealer. You take chances and risks that you need never take if you buy at home.

The World-Famous Garland Line

The kind of stoves that have proven best by forty years' test are sold only through dealers. These are the world-famous Garland Stoves and Ranges, now used in more than FOUR MILLION homes and sold by leading dealers everywhere.

No matter what style of stove you want, or how much you have in mind to pay for your stove, be sure to call at your dealer's and see the great Garland line. We will send you the name of the Garland Dealer in your town.

This is an elegant and luxurious garment, far greater value than any you have seen. It is 54 inches long, with wide shawl collar and deep cuffs, lined with guaranteed black satin, inside pocket. It has two metal buttons with silk cord loops; meets full in front.

In ordering, mention No. 1455.

You can have no idea what a perfect reproduction of the natural fur this is until you have seen the coat, tried it on and compared it with others you have seen. Experts are readily deceived by this and the other textile furs which we make up into fashionable garments. They give you all the warmth and fashion and beauty of expensive natural skins at a very modest price. They wear longer, do not shed hairs, and retain their richness and lustre until worn out.

We sell direct to wearer only, saving you all dealers' profits. This enables us to give better value for your money than is possible otherwise. In addition to Neva Caracal, we make garments of Lambskin, Persian Lamb, Balkan Lamb, Sealette, Nutria and Velour du Nord. These are all in the latest prevailing styles, fashioned after stunning imported models. They are all illustrated in our Fashion Book, mailed free. In ordering No. 1455 or other models,

The Standard of Life*

IN Longfellow's beautiful poem, "The Children of the Lord's Supper," the aged pastor is described as picturing thus the Christian ideal:

Lovest thou God as thou oughtest, then lovest thou likewise thy brethren;
One is the sun in heaven, and one, only one, is Love also.
Bears not each human figure the godlike stamp on his forehead?
Knowest thou him who forgave, with the crown of thorns round his temples?
Ah! thou confessest his name, so follow likewise his example.

The pastor enjoins hope and faith also upon his young audience, but it is love, "the greatest of these," upon which he chiefly dwells, for unselfish love toward God and man truly comprehends the whole of the Christian ideal. Jesus himself is the authority for this view. (See Matt. 22: 37-39.)

We are accustomed to think of the martyrs as the supreme examples of true love to God. Most of us want to serve him. We are even ready to suffer somewhat for his sake; but when we read of the tortures which were endured gladly by hundreds of the "noble army of the martyrs," our love seems to possess little substance, compared with theirs.

Crispin and Crispinianus were two Roman Christians, brothers, who went as missionaries from Rome to Gaul in Diocletian's reign. They settled themselves at Soissons, and in order not to be burdensome to their converts, they learned the trade of shoemaking, so that they are to this day the patron saints of all shoemakers. In spite of the cruel persecutions of Riccius Varus, the heathen governor of the province, who, according to the existing traditions, plunged them first into a freezing river and then into boiling pitch, they were miraculously preserved to preach their beloved Gospel for many years afterward. They were finally beheaded by order of Maximian.

Many people on reading this will say that no such appalling cruelties are now practised upon believers—that we have no chance to offer our bodies thus upon God's altar—but you are mistaken. Read the stories of the Boxer revolt, of the Turkish atrocities of a decade and less ago, of the Micronesian horrors. No martyr of old ever suffered more for his faith than have these modern missionaries, dying bravely for their Lord, and sorry only that they had "but one life to give" for him.

To most of us, in our comfortable homes, with our easy weekly routine of church-going, mid-week meeting, and perhaps teaching in the Sunday School, how enormous look those missionary sufferings. Could we ever give so much for Christ?

We are reminded by Mr. Peile, the distinguished English minister, that the problems which confront the Christians of to-day are "curiously similar" to those which the apostles and the early church fathers met. There is the same intellectual unrest, the same eager longing for a Gospel which shall satisfy deeper needs than those for bodily well-being and amusement, and there is virtually a "slave" population, as there was then—the oppressed, the suffering, the hopeless.

And to them we have the same message: Jesus Christ, the wisdom and the power of God. No higher standard will ever be furnished for helpless men to follow, than the standard set by our Master. It is a standard for the heart. Outward ceremonies will never avail to reach it. By hard and bitter blows we, under God, must mould, each for himself, a Christian character. May he help us to do it!

It is Like a Lash Across a Woman's Face: Said a Man When He Read Mr. Kipling's New Poem

It is a "woman's poem," called "The Female of the Species."

With a sting that fairly bites, Mr. Kipling lashes a type of woman: the female of a species that, he says, "is more deadly than the male," and puts on record a poem that will make thousands of women uncomfortable and will take a place all its own in the modern feminine unrest.

As a direct contribution to the "Votes for Women" agitation, the poem is a masterpiece.

In no other American periodical will this new poem by Rudyard Kipling appear save in the November LADIES' HOME JOURNAL.

Two Words That Every Woman Should Remember

A noted woman-doctor tells what is "the greatest enemy that a woman has:" what women do to fight it, and how thousands of women bring about heart-failure and death by doing just the wrong thing. And all a woman, to avoid danger, has to do is to remember two words and keep her eyes open for them.

It is really an actual instance where two words might save the sufferings and deaths of thousands of women.

Every woman should read this article. Husbands, too, for that matter, to help their wives remember.

It is in the November LADIES' HOME JOURNAL.

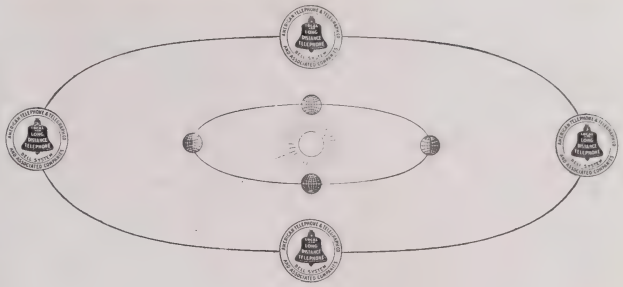
WE may purchase now the separate Gospels or other books of the Bible. You can carry one with you in pocket or bag, and you will find it an ever-growing comfort, for one great beauty of the Bible is that we can read it all our lives long without exhausting its charm. It is ever fresh and ever new. Nearly every Christian whom one meets on his journeys has one of these little Bible booklets, and the one most frequently met with is the precious Gospel of John. It would seem that no other book in the world comes quite so close to the human soul as does this warm and loving story.

It is supposed that John was born in Bethsaida of Galilee, about the year 4 B.C. He was almost certainly related to our Lord, probably his cousin, and probably the parents of both were of the tribe of Levi. John was evidently an intimate friend of Caiaphas the High Priest, and various allusions in Scripture indicate that his family were fairly well-to-do.



We may well believe that the countenance of John was, if not actually beautiful, yet very attractive. Our Lord, even as he first looked upon him, loved him. It is clear from John's writings that his soul was informed throughout with love, and "love lights love again." Thus it would seem that he was well beloved not only of Christ, but of his fellow-apostles also. Jesus desired to have John ever at his side. He was with the Lord in the chamber of death (Mark 5: 37); in the glory of the transfiguration (Matt. 17: 1); when he predicts the destruction of the holy city (Mark 13: 3); and in the agony of Gethsemane.

Still, John was not the meek and quiet creature whom some of us may picture him. His nickname, "Boanerges," implies that he was, as Dr. McClintock says, "vehement and intense." He seemed to join with his mother in asking that he might stand next to Jesus, when he should come into his kingdom, which shows that he was not without ambition; he rebuked harshly the "prophet" who was casting out devils in the name of Christ, while not following him; and he sought to call down fire from heaven upon a Samaritan village. These surely indicate a temper of some violence.

It is supposed that John was never married, though a large part of his career is veiled in mystery. His name disappears for a long period from the sacred record. From the fact that in some manuscripts of the New Testament the First Epistle of John is addressed to the Parthians, it is thought that he may have passed some of these silent years as a missionary to them. All we know is that he became the Bishop of Ephesus, and that from that place he went to Patmos, having been driven thither by persecution. We know that the seven churches of Asia were objects of especial solicitude to him, and became thus, probably, through long labors on his part among them. That he lived to a great age, and far beyond the time of his friends among Christ's followers, is also sure; and in the works of Clement of Alexandria and Eusebius are told many beautiful stories of his life, though not all are authentic. Even the time of his death and its method are uncertain. Its date ranges from 89 A.D. to 120.

This uncertainty has been seized by Robert Browning as an opportunity to imagine the mode of the great apostle's departure from the world, and you will be well repaid if you will read in connection with this lesson his fine poem, "A Death in the Desert," which pictures John in the end as lying, in the same way that he lay on earth at the last supper, "breast to breast with God."

Comparison of the Distance Traveled by Earth and Bell Telephone Messages

The Orbit of Universal Service

In one year the earth on its orbit around the sun travels 584,000,000 miles; in the same time telephone messages travel 23,600,000,000 miles over the pathways provided by the Bell system. That means that the 7,175,000,000 Bell conversations cover a distance forty times that traveled by the earth.

When it is considered that each telephone connection includes replies as well as messages, the mileage of talk becomes even greater.

These aggregate distances, which exceed in their total the limits of the Solar system, are actually confined within the boundaries of the United States. They show the progress that has been made towards universal service and the intensive intercommunication between 90,000,000 people.

No such mileage of talk could be possible in such a limited area were it not that each telephone is the center of one universal system.

A BIG, VITAL NOVEL BY
One of the Leaders of the Colored Race

The Quest OF THE Silver Fleece

By WILLIAM E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS

PROFESSOR DU BOIS is the author of "The Souls of Black Folk," now in its eighth edition. His new novel is a work of unusual power, of stern realism, and of great beauty.

The story is laid in the South and in Washington, and not only shows the struggles often against impossible odds—of the negro who desires to develop his personality, but shows the economic roots of many of the injustices which stand between the negro and the open sky of real freedom.

From the standpoint of his hero and heroine, feeling their woes as only a brother in blood can, and seeing the genesis of those woes as only a trained sociologist can, Dr. Du Bois, the admitted prophet and idealist of his race, makes a plea for them that cannot be evaded.

WILL CHINA BECOME A REPUBLIC?

CHINA is once more confronted by a revolution, the avowed object of which is the overthrow of the Manchu dynasty and the establishment of a republic. Not since the famous Boxer uprising has there been so formidable a revolt against the ruling powers. Beginning in the province of Szechuen, the movement has spread to and practically overrun the adjoining provinces of Hunan and Hupeh, and threatens to engulf a large section of Central China. Fortified cities have surrendered to the rebels, and armed garrisons, after a perfunctory opposition or no resistance at all, have been swept into the ranks, and now form part of the revolutionary forces.

It is characteristic of the Chinese that little news of the progress of the revolt and the efforts for its suppression is permitted to become known to the outside world. All telegraphic wires connecting with the disturbed provinces have been cut. It is known, however, that the revolutionists, under General Li Yuan Heng, have control of three large cities—Hankow, Wuchang, and Hanyang—and are assuring foreigners of protection. General Li has issued a manifesto, exhorting the Chinese people to "unite in their strength and drive out the Manchu traitors."

There has been sharp fighting at many points, but details are meagre. A correspondent who visited Wuchang reports that many buildings have been demolished; there are numerous bodies lying in the streets. At one of the city gates, fifty corpses lay in a heap. Eight hundred Manchus were killed during the rebel attack.

General Li has established his headquarters at Wuchang, and has 20,000 to 30,000 troops under his command. The revolutionists seem to have plenty of funds and food supplies. Viceroy Tang, of Wuchang, said: "The object of our revolt is to make the government of China like that of America. The present taxes, if honestly administered, would provide revenue to meet our loan obligations, with a surplus for internal developments which we have planned, such as harnessing rivers and building railways. We may be able to do all we have planned without foreign loans, but we will borrow if necessary. We are determined to be on friendly terms with foreign nations."

At Hankow the rebels are in practical control. Four British warships and two each belonging to the United States, German and Japanese navies are protecting foreigners. There are eight Chinese imperial warships anchored in the river, but well out of reach of the rebel cannon.

Yuan Shi Kai, the exiled War Minister, has been recalled by the Imperial Government, and is again in power. He will direct operations with a view to suppressing the rebellion. It will be a formidable undertaking, however. The revolutionary leaders claim to have abundant means to carry on the war for a long period. There is little doubt that before it can be checked, the movement will spread to Hunan, Kiangsi, Kweichow and Yunan Provinces. A well-informed correspondent says of its character and extent:

"Everywhere the movement is headed by foreign-drilled troops, who keep the populace under control and prevent outrages upon Europeans and Americans. It is a military uprising like the mutiny of the Sepoys in India half a century ago, and all troops with modern arms and tactics are swept into it. Behind the soldiers is a systematic revolutionary propaganda far more serious than the discontent of a population over a failure of crops, with a consequent shortage of food. Chinese students trained in Japan, America and Europe have returned to their country with the determination to reform and modernize it. Middle China is honeycombed with secret societies, and military officers are everywhere. The rebels may succeed in making Nanking their stronghold and exciting the spirit of revolt in Canton. The Imperial Government is turning to Yuan Shi Kai, who was foolishly dismissed because he was convinced of the necessity for reform. Apparently the garrisons of middle China are untrustworthy, and even the value of northern battalions remains to be tested."

Dr. Sun Yat Sen

At Peking, the capital, there is outward calm, but deep forebodings under the surface. It is reported there that the rebels captured at Wuchang 36 mountain and 36 field guns, and about 100 other cannon at Hanyang, so that they are strong in artillery. They also secured a large supply of modern rifles and ammunition at Hanyang, which is the great manufacturing arsenal of the government. Precautions are being taken against a possible rising in Peking. The garrison has been strengthened and the police are now armed with rifles. The American Embassy is under guard.

In San Francisco, where there are many Chinese, news has been received by cable telling of the progress of the revolution. Three government gunboats were sunk near Hankow by the rebel batteries. A force of imperial troops in Hupeh Province rebelled against its officers, and many joined the revolutionists. Two imperial warships were destroyed at Wuchang by the forts. Ten thousand government troops went over to the rebels at Hangweng. Shanghai cables report the capture of Nanking, the ancient capital, by the victorious rebel army. Kiukiang is also reported as having surrendered. An uprising of the troops at the Woosung forts, near the mouth of the Yangtse, is looked for.

An unexpected turn of affairs, which may lead to important results, took place on Tuesday, October 17, when a force of bluejackets from the German cruiser Leipsic and the German gunboats Tiger and Vaterland were landed at Hankow. They were reinforced by German local

The Glory Of Jesus

Text: "He bringeth them up into a high mountain apart, and was transfigured before them."— Matt. 17:1,2

IN THIS transfiguration scene the disciples for the first time beheld their Lord in his true relation to the celestial world. Only imagination can conceive the effect wrought upon them by this dazzling disclosure of his heavenly connections, or the distinct epoch that would be thereby created in the history of their belief in him. Although the revelation was comparatively but momentary, yet there was the revelation. The Lord for an instant stood before them in the manifest light of God. A glory that was neither from land nor sea had touched his face with a complexion that betrayed his kinship with the Great Spirit above and his citizenship in regions that were far abroad.

And the meaning of the scene in something of the immensity of its import entered their souls, and recorded itself there in lines that were ineffaceable. Whatever the scenes of distress and humiliation through which they might subsequently see him pass, there still remained in them indelibly printed the memory of the day when they had seen him stand upon the Mount, close in under the cover of the sky, enveloped with a splendor which nature could not explain and in the midst of companionship whose belongings were in the great years and in the realm supernal. It was a great moment; great in its instant impression upon them; great in its indestructible hold upon them.

The Apostle's Vision

What it signified at the moment to the three disciples that witnessed it and what it continued to denote as a permanent element in their experience, we can easily infer from the language subsequently used by one of them, who wrote: "For we have not followed cunningly devised fables when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his majesty. For he received from God the Father honor and glory when there came such a voice to him from the sublime glory [that is, from God], 'This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.' And this voice which came from heaven we heard, and were with him in the Holy Mount." You perceive how that impression had stayed by, how it had worked in the mind of him who had witnessed the great transaction, and had become a fixed factor in his own realization, and made him forever competent to speak a strong word, so full of conscious truth as to cut a broad swath of irresistible persuasion whenever the word was spoken.

Now, right in that lies the fact that I want to make use of this morning: the fact of the power and the grasp and the inspiriting appreciation of things, that accrued to the apostle from having with his own eyes beheld the Christ standing glorified by the light that shone upon him from above; from having seen him revealed in his evident relations to the realm of the heavenly and divine, so that from that time on all his thoughts above him and all his words concerning him were thrilled and made to tingle with the reminiscence of the splendid apocalypse personally witnessed by him in the Holy Mount. It was the glimpse that the apostle gained, on that transfiguration day, of a profound world underlying, overlying, enveloping the common shows of things, that made the apostle great, widening him a little to the width of the spiritual universe that was for a moment uncovered to him, enabling him to interpret facts in all their high and brilliant import and to assert those facts with an assurance begotten of a searching experience.

The Greater World Above Us

And there is more involved here than appears at first sight. I find in it a meaning that extends itself over a wider area than any that is traversed by this single incident. The three disciples present on that occasion were permitted to stand at a point where the light that shines from below upward was met by the light that comes from the other way. They were at the frontier. Perhaps that frontier is never far away, and yet perhaps we only infrequently, perhaps never, come quite to the bounding line, never have seen Christ, never have seen anything, made brilliant with a transfiguring light—light that is, that uncovers the skyward, Godward import of things and expounds matters to us in their tremendous interpretations.

And yet I should think that we must all of us, at some time, in some little minute, have felt, however obscurely, the closeness to us, if not the actual presence, of things which eye hath not seen nor ear heard. There are probably very few souls but do on occasion—very rare occasion possibly—have discernments that run out on routes too ill-defined ever to be reduced to the lines of a definite chart. There is a great deal of it in the Bible, and a great deal of it, too, probably in the Bible that has not yet been put in type, but which if well printed would read a good deal like the Bible we have now.

What we have just tried to state is almost a necessary prerequisite to all fine living, large speaking and great working. The powerful doers of the Bible, old and new, had something shown to them before they commenced work. The chieftains of events may have had to live on low ground, but they would never have been able to become chieftains if at some time something had not come into their eye that low ground never would have lain near enough to the sky to be able to show them. We lately mentioned Moses' burning bush. Moses had been doing small things—tending sheep, and other paltry business, too pusillanimous ever to have gone upon the record—for eighty years before the vision of God came to him in the flame at Horeb; and then for the first time the true life of the great general, lawgiver and statesman began. That bush introduced Moses to the world because it introduced the world to Moses—the great world I mean, that world that is made up of eternal meanings, and which holds in its vast embrace this small globe of rock, forest and ocean as a tiny island is held in the lap of the sea.

The "Great Light" That Shone on Paul

St. Paul's real life, you remember also, commenced with seeing what he called a great "light." It would be of no particular advantage to try to probe the mysteries of that event. Excited emotions may to some extent have furnished the colors in which he portrayed the scene that transpired on the way to Damascus, but there was in some way and at that time a great uncovering to his eyes or to his heart of what had before been concealed. Whether it was that his powers of vision, spiritual vision, were unnaturally strengthened, or that by some means the atmosphere in which the activities of mind operate was conveniently cleansed of whatever tends to impede those activities, is of little practical importance. But it is sufficiently evident from what he himself tells us of the event, and from the entirely new tone and direction communicated to his life by that event, that altogether a new world was at that time disclosed to him; not that things were changed, but that a celestial complexion was put upon them, a heavenly significance communicated to them, and they stood forth before him transfigured in the glow of the mystic illumination.

The reports preserved to us of such experiences have oftentimes to be discounted; but that will have to depend mostly upon the general quality and structure of the person of whom the experiences are predicated. That Abraham was a man of such fibre and proportions as to be able to dominate religiously the forty centuries that have intervened between his day and our own would seem to be a rather convincing endorsement of his claim to have stood at one time where both ground and sky were brightened by the ineffable Presence, and where even the long track of the ages to come lay out partly disclosed to him under the transfiguring light that fell upon that track from above.

That Moses was a man of such grasp upon the moral foundation of things, having a moral intuition so keen in perforating the very tissue of character and act that his ethical system to-day, after so long a time, still lies at the basis of our own moral structure of duty as between man and man and man and God, all of this creates a tremendous presumption in support of his claim that he wrought not alone by the light of a candle humanly kindled; a tremendous presumption that he was warranted in insisting that his ethical code was a quotation from the mind of God; and that it was because human relations of obligation stood out before his eye under the glow of a heavenly transfigurement that he was able to state those relations in a way that should be true to the finest consciences of the finest men for a period of 3,500 years. Men who can do that have got to be believed. Likewise of the man St. Paul, that rugged old apostle to the Gentiles. Words that such people speak, claims that such people make, will have to be taken at their face value. When you bethink yourself of the fact that nineteen centuries of strong religious thinking rest down compactly upon the massive theological propositions enunciated by St. Paul, it is silly to the point of imbecility to deny the validity of his claim to have been under the baptism of a light so intense as to singe his bodily eyes into temporary blindness; to have come, as he tells us in his Corinthian letter, within reach of utterances incapable of being translated into terms of any earthly vocabulary.

The Testimony of Holy Men

These are some of the faëts of our holy religion, and attested to by the testimony of men who have been too practical in all their dominance of historic event, too self-contained in all their administrative life, to be obnoxious to the charge of either insanity or delusion. You may not have seen a great light; but St. Paul did, or nineteen hundred years of great doctrinal thinking are the mere baseless fabric of a theological dream. You may not have seen the clouds parted above you and a radiant avenue opened before you into the realm celestial; but Jesus did, or the great Christian era, with all of light, love and power in it that we call Christian, is an unfounded stupidity, shared in by millions of what purported to be intelligent souls, but who were all of them the dupes of a silly fancy when they lived, and the victims of a crazy delusion when they died.

The declaration of men like Paul, Jesus, Moses and Abraham, who have marshaled the centuries by the power of their thought and life, are not declarations that you can finger and sort over and blot out at the impulse of a jejune cynicism. It is not credulity to bank on the utterances of such men; it is incredulity not to bank on them. The average man may not have had their experiences; but what is the average man that he presumes to blue-pencil the unequivocal declarations of men who have moved as giants in the midst of the years, masters of event and creators of destiny?

And so we come back to it: that it was the glimpse of great things, touches of transfiguration, beholden by men who once in a while stood at the frontier where the light from the ground was met by the light that beamed from on high, that was the secret of their long thinking and great working.

It is much to stand down in the valley of a beautiful landscape and to imagine the distant course of the rivers and to fancy the miles of stimulating prospect that must lie out an easy picture to the eye of one who looks upon it from the heights. But it is a distinct thing to stand upon those heights, to live in the companionship of the lofty places of the earth, and follow with an easy vision the long lines of the rivers that like glistening threads of silver wind in and out among the hills. Such transfigurement is fraught with unspeakable stimulus, even when it is merely mountains and forests that are interpreted by the light that falls upon them from a superior altitude. And how much more when it is the features of a moral and spiritual landscape that are passing under review—when it is duties, not things; men, and not rocks; processes of history, and not geography; souls and the life and destinies of souls, and not material impersonalities, that are to be interpreted and valued in the transfiguring light that cometh from above!

Man's Escape

And such is my conception of the intention of the Scripture, such my conception of the possibilities of the human mind and heart, and such my belief in the illuminating powers of the Divine Spirit, as compels me to believe, and enables me just a little to know and understand, that the greater meanings of things are, to some extent, within our reach; that we are not condemned to imprisonment in a world so closely walled and barred as to obstruct escape into a region furnished with some such realities as were witnessed by Moses at the Bush and on the top of Sinai, by Paul at Damascus, by Peter at the Holy Mount, and by Jesus at the Jordan.

I am not talking about this because of any theoretical interest that may be excited by such mode of

EVENING SONG

O SINGER, a song for the eventide,
A song for the twilight deep.
My life is cumbered with many a care,
With crosses and burdens heavy to bear,
As footsore and weary I onward fare
O'er paths so rugged and steep.

But when day is done, its toil, its glare,
And the shadows round me creep,
I would upward waft on the evening air
A hymn of praise for His tender care,
For heaven's deep peace, beyond compare.
Then, singer, a song for the evening hour,
A song for the twilight deep.

Ringing the Joy Bells

By EUGENE THWING

DID you ever hear the wonderful story of Feldkirch, a little town on the Austrian frontier? It reminds one of Gideon and his three hundred trumpeters. Feldkirch had less than three thousand inhabitants and no strong defenses, when, in 1799, Massena, one of Napoleon's generals, suddenly appeared on the heights above the town at the head of 18,000 men. The victorious armies of Napoleon were sweeping over the continent, and little Feldkirch was thought to be no barrier at all in their way.

The sun of an Easter morning revealed the glittering weapons of the French on the hills west of the town. The council assembled hastily to consider what should be done. Defense was impossible. It was proposed that a deputation be sent to Massena with the keys of the town, and that he be entreated to deal mercifully with the place.

The aged dean of the church counseled otherwise. "It is the glad Easter day," said he. "We have been measuring our own strength, and we are frightened at its littleness. This is the day of our Lord's resurrection. Let us ring the joy bells and have service, as our custom is, and leave matters that are too big for us in God's hands. We know our weakness; we know not his power."

The old dean's word prevailed. All at once, from the three or four towers in Feldkirch the bells began to clang in joyous peals. The streets were filled with worshipers hastening to the house of God, to commemorate the resurrection. In the hills above the town the French heard with surprise and alarm the sudden clangor of the joy bells. It must mean, they thought, that the Austrian army had arrived in the night to relieve the town. Hurriedly, Massena broke up his camp, and before the bells stopped ringing, not a Frenchman was to be seen.

IF THE devil could enforce a single edict throughout the world, I imagine it would be, "The joy bells shall not ring to-day." He would keep them forever silent; they disturb him and interfere with his work wherever they sound in town or in country, by night or by day. The Chinese have a habit of pasting colored paper signs above their doorways to keep certain devils from entering their houses. If in our own homes the rope to the joy bells is kept close at hand, and each member of the family will give it a pull whenever trouble threatens, all the devils that make so many homes miserable will be driven completely out and away.

Anger and malice, disputings and contentions cannot survive the music of the joy bells. Even sickness and pain will yield, more often than is generally supposed, to the sweet, inspiriting rhythm of the joy bells. A laugh, a smile, a song will be enough to start the joy bells ringing in the heart, will soothe the pain and brighten the moment of distress.

A little girl, eight years of age, was taken to the doctor to have a bad cut in her head dressed. It was necessary to take a few stitches with a surgeon's needle. The mother was trying to encourage her little daughter to be brave. "It will do no harm for her to give way to her feelings," said the doctor, kindly, "if only she holds her hand still. You may cry as much as you like," he added to the little girl. "I'd rather sing," replied the child. "Yes, that would be better. What can you sing?" "I can sing, 'Give, Said the Little Stream.' Do you know that?" "I think not," said the doctor. "How does it begin?" The little patient proceeded to illustrate. "That is beautiful. I want to hear all of it," declared the doctor. All the while the skilled fingers were sewing up the wound, the sweet childish voice sang bravely through the verses of the song, and the only tears shed during the painful operation came from the mother's eyes.

MAKERS of joy are the greatest need for which the suffering old world is always yearning. A brilliant Italian woman, Dora Melegari, has written a book on the subject. Its title is Makers of Sorrow and Makers of Joy. In one of the chapters she says, "Have you known any makers of joy? I have met several in my life, and am convinced that the continuation of the human race is due to them. Without the smiles they have called forth, the songs that rise in the hearts they have cheered, and the radiance they diffuse into the lives of others, the sun would have long ceased to shine on a world sunk in sadness and gloom; the earth would have grown cold, and the last shivering man would have expired. They alone have saved us, and will continue to save us. Happily they are more numerous than the 'ten just men' whom the Almighty demanded of Sodom and Gomorrah, to save those two cities from destruction by fire and brimstone."

Before we can be makers of joy, before we can set the joy bells ringing in the sad hearts about us, we must have a genuine and abounding joy in our own hearts. It is impossible to give any thirsty soul drink out of an empty cup.

The richest possession any of us may ever hope to have is the unselfish joy and sweetness of life, which brims over into empty, needy lives that touch our own. "To write a poem, an essay, or a volume," said a sympathetic writer, "that shall interest and influence thousands, does not give the sense of personal satisfaction to the writer that comes with the consciousness of giving encouragement and cheer to one aching heart or troubled soul, that might have fainted or failed but for this stimulus and aid."

RING the joy bells! It is the best form of crusade you can make against misery, selfishness and sin. If the music of their chime does not respond at once, perhaps you have not laid hold of the right rope. There is a string that reaches every heart if you have the patience and love to find it.

Ring the joy bells! It is the best campaign you can make against many of the foes that seek to overwhelm and destroy you. Courage grows mighty, and fear, worry, mean temptations, bodily and spiritual weakness take flight when you make the melody of trustful praise in your heart to the Lord.

Ring the joy bells! It is the best you can do as your share in the great task of drowning out the hoarse voice of war, and cheering the world onward and upward to the glad era of "peace on earth, good will toward men."

AN INFLUENCE

YOU lived life bravely!
And though the fight was hard and long,
You never flinched from what was right,
But through dark watches of the night
You filled the hours with song.

You lived life sweetly!
Your presence brightened all the day;
Though so much sorrow crossed your path,
You met it with a quiet faith
That swept all bitterness away.

You lived life nobly!
For by your generous self-denial,
Others were taught to see the light
That makes men strive for what is right,
And meet life bravely with a smile.

How They Use the Bible

By W. H. Jordan

ONE of the most interesting campaigns for Bible reading was that tried in a school where a record was kept of the reading of each member of the class, and the report given two weeks later, and then a month still later. In five months, twenty-one had completed the New Testament and many others had read half or more of the Testament. Not only members of the school, but others—parents and friends—were interested and read with the children. One elderly lady telephoned to the pastor that she had read seventy-eight chapters that week!

In the primary department the children had been asked to read three verses a day. Some very little folks had read half of the New Testament. Instead of toys given at Christmas, seventy illustrated New Testaments were put out and heartily appreciated, many books reaching homes where no Bible was found. Our schools are the best possible agencies for distributing the Bible and good literature and the opportunity which each Sabbath affords ought not to be neglected.

But while "bulk" reading is one method of helping the reader to get better acquainted with the Bible, it is by no means thorough. The Word must be studied. The Rev. W. R. Williams tells of the work in the Welsh churches: "The Welsh are noted for their thoroughness of the study of the Bible. Every six months they conduct a written and an oral examination in the courses prepared for the schools. For two evenings written examinations were held. The third evening I examined the children orally in the Catechism, and also I listened to a number of the adults reciting portions of the Scriptures from memory. Sunday afternoon I examined orally for a whole hour the adult department of the school in the Epistle to the Colossians. This was as critical as any conducted in a theological seminary. It was a week, I assure you, of very strenuous work. I wish we could make schools of our Sunday Schools. We are making an effort toward this end now."

Women Weavers of the Navajos

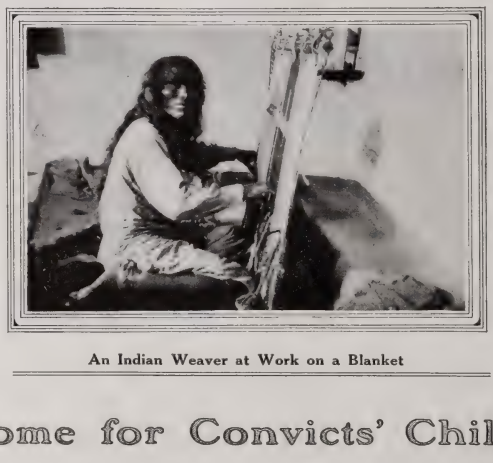
Hauling Wool for the Weavers on a Navajo Reservation

A Navajo Summer Home and Some of Its Occupants

LONG before the arrival of the first white man in America the weaving of Navajo blankets was a native industry. It has survived the shock of intimate contact with civilization. It is believed that the value of the Navajo Indian blankets manufactured by that tribe each year is nearly $500,000. This is an astonishing showing for an industry carried on solely by the manual labor of desert squaws who still adhere to primitive methods and appliances. Our government is desirous of lending encouragement to the tribespeople, so that the industry may be developed. Most of the Navajo sheep are mongrels. The wool is short and coarse, and scanty. Improved breeds of sheep would give wool of much finer quality, and the texture of the blanket would be correspondingly improved. Besides, the use of inferior coal tar dyes is common; and these will not stand hard usage. The men of the tribe still have the old idea that herding sheep, carding wool and weaving blankets are labors for squaws and derogatory to the dignity of warriors. The Navajo men have been employed to a large extent in railroad construction and repair work, digging of irrigation ditches, farm labor, and in the sugar beet fields of Colorado. If the men would help the women folks, the earnings of each tribal family could easily be made to average $500 annually, which would mean industrial independence and comparative affluence.

The present population of the Navajo nation is about 28,000. They own probably one million sheep, in addition to a large number of goats. In these two great tribal industries, which are their main support, the men are hardly a productive factor at all.

Blanket-weaving is of prehistoric origin, cotton blankets having been found in ruined cliff dwellings of great antiquity. The Pueblo communities cultivated cotton, and wore garments made of cotton when visited by the Spanish Friar Marcos in 1538 and by Coronado in 1540. From the Pueblos the semi-nomadic Navajos acquired the loom and learned the art of weaving.



Since 1867, the Navajos have never gone on the war path, although they have made raids upon the territories of the Utes and Pueblos, to obtain sheep, goats, ponies and burros. To give them a fresh start, the government distributed among them a large number of sheep and goats, and rendered other assistance; but for more than forty years they have received no government aid of any kind, except in the winter of 1894-'95 when their crops failed.

The most highly prized of their weaves of blankets are known as bayeta blankets. These w[ere] woven, wholly or in part, of yarn. Many old ba[ck]tas are valued at anywhere from $250 to $1,0[00] each.

Navajo blankets of the commoner kind may [be] purchased from the squaws in their logans, or f[rom] reservation traders, or in the towns of Arizona [and] New Mexico and curio stores throughout the W[est]. They are either woven of Germantown yarn, or [of] yarn spun by the squaws from wool clipped off th[eir] sheep, and carded, spun and dyed by their [own] hands. They are desired by the whites more [on] account of their novelty than of their beauty, [and] are used on porches, in summer cottages and bun[ga]lows, for the fitting up of so-called "Indian roo[ms]" and "dens," and as rugs, portières, p[ad]s, robes, etc.

The Navajo blanket owes nothing wh[at]ever to the standards of taste that previ[l] in civilized communities. It is "someth[ing] different." The squaw weaves "out of [her] own head," with no pattern to guide h[er]. Even when traders induce the weavers [to] attempt to copy blankets of patterns, [the] copies are never exact in details. [The] owner of a Navajo blanket, therefore, m[ay] feel reasonably certain that there is [no] another just like it in the world.

Much unadulterated nonsense has b[een] written concerning the symbolism of th[e] blankets, and the poetry, legend, traditi[on] and history woven by the squaw into [the] fabric. It is true that some designs hav[e] symbolic meaning, but Hopi, Zuñi [and] Apache symbols are used quite as freely [as] those peculiar to the Navajos. The Navaj[o] squaw is one of the least imaginative [and] least poetical of human beings; and it [is] quite safe to say that even when symbo[lic] designs are employed in blanket weaving [it] is without the remotest reference to th[eir] true significance. An Indian Weaver at Work on a Blanket

A Home for Convicts' Children

WHAT becomes of the children of convicts? Every day some man is sentenced to prison, who leaves behind him boys or girls or both who must be fed and clothed and housed. The judge who pronounces sentence on the erring father cannot concern himself about the wife and children who are left to shift for themselves. His business is to see that the offender is sent to prison for his crime. It is, in fact, no one's business in particular what the wife and children of the convict do to support themselves, when the father of the family is in jail. This condition of things has long puzzled Mrs. Ballington Booth, who has made work among prisoners her life mission. Many convicts with whom she has talked in the prisons have begged her to do something for their children, to keep from them if possible a knowledge of the fact that their father is a convict, and to take them away somewhere, where they will be brought up among wholesome surroundings and a healthy environment. Many pitiful cases of destitution among the families of convicts have come under the notice of Mrs. Booth in the course of her evangelistic work in the prisons. She planned to establish a home for these innocent victims of another's wrong-doing, and recently the opportunity came. Now, in a beautiful place at Gwynedd Valley, near Philadelphia, the work has been established. The two buildings were originally designed as a home for convalescent children. The main structure is equipped for the reception of as many as seventy-five boys and girls, and in addition fifty mothers can be accommodated when the arrangements are completed. The buildings and grounds, with furniture, beds, bedding and crockery, were given to Mrs. Ballington Booth for her use as long as she will use them in the work she has in view.

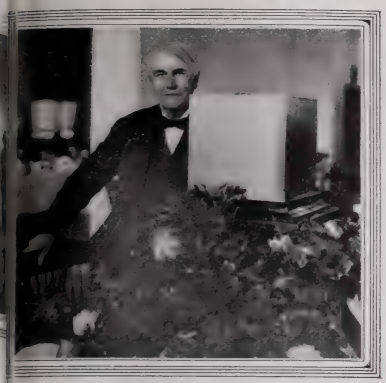
The intention is to convert this smaller buildi[ng] into a clubhouse for the mothers, where they c[an] gather in the afternoon and sew and converse a[nd] forget their troubles for the time at least.



SOME TIME, SOMEWHERE

UNANSWERED yet? The prayer your lips have plead[ed]
In agony of heart these many years?
Does faith begin to fail? is hope departing?
And think you all in vain these falling tears?
Say not the Father hath not heard your prayer;
You shall have your desire some time, somewhere!

Unanswered yet? though when you first presented
This one petition at the Father's throne,
It seemed you could not wait the time of asking,
So urgent was your heart to make it known;
Though years have passed since then, do not despair;
The Lord will answer you some time, somewhere!

Unanswered yet? Nay, do not say ungranted;
Perhaps your part is not yet wholly done;
The work began when first your prayer was uttered,
And God will finish what he has begun;
If you but keep the incense burning there,
His glory you shall see, some time, somewhere!

THE ELECTRICAL SHOW OF 1911

Edison Monthly

Thomas A. Edison and His Block of Copper

WHEN at 7.30 P.M., on October 11, Thomas A. Edison pressed a button in his laboratory at Orange, N. J., and so lighted the 000 electric bulbs and started the many hundreds wheels in the New Grand Central Palace in New k, the most elaborate electric show that has ever n held opened its doors to the public. Upward a million candle-power was developed by the riad of lights that decorated the booths and med the general lighting arrangements of the lding. Against the white walls of the pillars it ne with reflected brilliance to display the won- ful diversity of the exhibits. Here, amongst a est of palms that waved in the electric breeze of housand fans, one might have a cup of electrically wed tea and bit of electrically made toast; while re, but a few yards away, the mechanism of a -ton storage battery truck was being explained. he Electrical Exposition of 1911 was formally nched at a luncheon en by the New York Edi- Company to Thomas Edison, the father of dern electrical develop- nt. The most striking ident in connection with s event was a gift from producers and consum- of copper which would ress their appreciation the part Mr. Edison's entions have played in stimulation of the cop- industry. This gift s a cubic foot of copper ighing 486 pounds. dison" is the simple cription on the top of cube. One face bore s lettering:

Edison's first invention
October 15, 1869
put of copper, 357,500,000 lbs.
October 15, 1910
put of copper, 1,500,000,000 lbs.

'It might make a good perweight," said Mr. ison reflectively, as he pected his new acquisi- n after the luncheon. me one suggested that, king any other use for he could keep it in his rary for Mrs. Edison to st and keep nicely pol- ed. In every way the most eresting exhibits of the position are those which w the application of ctricity to household tasks and uses. In dozens booths all through the Palace there may be found chines designed for the lightening of the duties the housewife. Everything from a coffee perco- or and a toaster to a sewing machine and a dish sher may be found operating for the benefit of the erested crowds. The exhibit of the Brooklyn ison Company was perhaps the most charming the entire show. Here, with the assistance of furniture department of John Wanamaker, a y model home had been constructed. From its nt porch to its kitchen electricity was in use on ery hand. In the hall, electric lights displayed beauty of the furnishings, and a vacuum cleaner erated by an electric motor showed how they ght be kept in their original freshness. In the rlor electricity played the piano, and threw a glow warmth from the fireplace. In the charming little bedroom electricity would heat my lady's curling tongs, warm his majesty the baby's bottle, and dry the shampooed hair of the entire household. In the dining room, electrical appliances upon the sideboard would boil the eggs, cook the cereal, and make the toast and coffee, to say nothing of keeping the plates hot and heating the chafing dish. In the kitchen, the cook was mixing cake by electricity and baking it in an electric stove; while the materials for her future use were kept chilled in an electric refrigerator, and a little motor drove the machine which did the family washing. Electric irons stood ready for use when the clothes should come from the electric dryer.

Following the lead of a number of European governments exhibits have been arranged by some of the United States Government officials, illustrating the relation of electricity to a number of departments of Federal activities. Among these the most interesting were the ones from the Army and Navy, the Bureau of Standards, the Department of Agriculture and the National Museum. The Coast Artillery had on exhibition a splendid model showing a system of harbor protection by means of submarine mines and land batteries. A long glass tank filled to a depth of about three feet with water contained twenty-three tiny submarine mines. A model of a fully equipped battleship floated upon the surface of the water and upon either side was a land fort equipped with modern disappearing guns and all the most up-to-date armament. The tiny battleship was propelled across the tank by electricity, and when it came in contact with one of the submarine mines, the mine flashed up while the vessel rocked and listed to port, her stacks, masts, turrets and other above-deck equipment collapsing and giving the impression of a ship being blown up. Ten men from the electrical school of the Brooklyn Navy Yard were in charge of the part of the naval exhibit which showed the operation of the wireless equipment of a battleship, as well as the electric panel-board which worked in conjunction with a set of signal lights such as are used on battleships to flash signals from ship to ship at night. The Commissary Department of the navy had fitted up a model kitchen and model bakery, which were equipped with electrical meat-cutters and potato-peeling machines, dough-mixers, cooking ranges and many other culinary devices.

The Bureau of Standards at Washington exhibited for the benefit of consumers of electricity the standardizing apparatus used in the determination of electrical units.

A group of blocks of concrete, bricks and other building materials which had been subjected to long-continued though very slight electrical currents were exhibited to demonstrate the folly of using uninsulated electrical conductors. The National Museum's addition to the show was largely of the nature of historic data. These things consisted of models of electric motors and different parts of electrical machines, which dated back to the earliest days of the investigation of the subject. One of the most interesting was a Morse telegraph register and port rule, dated 1837. This was made by Samuel F. B. Morse himself, and was first exhibited in New York City on September 2, 1837.

A View of New York, the Electric City, at Night

The display of electrical machinery was of the most comprehensive sort. In one place a famous packing company was operating a model of the machines by which it makes its toothsome peanut butter; not far away a device for the use of bankers and those who must handle large quantities of coins was automatically counting pennies and rolling them up securely in bundles of fifty each. All the different sorts of office machinery, which are operated by electricity, were exhibited in large numbers. Here you might have your pencil sharpened by electricity, while but a few steps away a full set of books was being kept on an electric typewriter and billing machine. Electric automobiles of all descriptions were exhibited; every type from a light closed carriage for the doctor to a motor truck for the manufacturer.

The exhibit of the Westinghouse Companies provided some surprises for the initiated, as there were shown for the first time some improved motors with new control systems. Complete lines of the various insulating substances are exhibited and demonstrated. In its household department every imaginable device was to be found. Convenience and comfort were fairly spelled in its array of coffee-percolators, toaster-stoves, air heaters, heating pads, and nursery milk-warmers. The luminous radiator that threw its ruddy glow all round almost made one willing to accept the city's substitute for the crackling logs of the country. Motors, arc lamps, theatrical lights and a variety of household appliances make up the exhibits of the General Electric Company and the Western Electric Company. The General Electric Company exhibited its entire line of incandescent lamps and inverted arc lamps in addition to heating appliances, an extensive line of moving picture and theatrical lights, and a motor operating a printing press.

The Columbia Phonograph Company was exhibiting the dictaphone in operation. The storage batteries to which Mr. Edison has been devoting so much time during the last few years were exhibited in many different forms and were subjected to the severest tests that their inventor could devise to prove their absolute reliability.

One booth which never failed of its interested and admiring audience was that of the Janus Vacuum Goods Company. Here the glass blowers with their fiery torches were at work shaping the bottles and welding them together while other workmen coated the sides of the vacuums with silver; others fitted their air-tight stoppers and passed them on to be packed in the cases of wicker or leather in which they would be sold. The chocolate manufacturers had not overlooked this opportunity to show the public how they use the most up-to-date machinery in grinding the chocolate, moulding it into shape and finally wrapping it in its tinseled covers.

To Our Readers

AS THE season for the renewal of subscriptions is approaching, we would again request our regular readers to co-operate with us in expediting the heavy business of the next two months by sending in their renewals as soon as possible after receipt of our premium catalogue, which we are now sending to all.

Last year, many thousands of our friends responded cordially to this call, and we trust that a still larger number will do us the same kindness this season. When a publisher and his readers work hand in hand, there is a resultant benefit to both. In a business of such extensive proportions as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, every subscriber who anticipates the fixed date of renewal by a few weeks materially assists our Subscription Department, which has a gigantic task before it. By sending in your renewal early, you lighten the burden of work for hundreds of employees, which is an important consideration at a time when the heaviest volume of business is flowing in. We would urge you, therefore, not to wait for the regular date, but to send in your renewal promptly after reading this notice.

Now, a word as to our premiums. They are mentioned on page 1094. All of these premium books are positively ready for mailing at the present moment. We have taken time by the forelock this year, being resolved that there shall be no disappointments or delays in dealing with our readers. So you who read this may take it as a personal assurance that whatever book you may order as a premium with your subscription—whether Mrs. Sangster's splendid work, The Women of the Bible, or that wonderfully inspiring story of The Pilgrim Ship, by Dr. Black, or Samantha's mirth-provoking volume which tells of her latest adventures—you will get your premium promptly, and without a single day's delay.

Our CHRISTIAN HERALD Almanac, the first of its kind, and brim full of things that we are sure our readers will welcome, is now ready. From November 1 on, the Almanac will be mailed free to each subscriber immediately on receipt of renewal of subscription. It will also be sent free to all new subscribers.

Regarding our Magazine Combination Offers, we wish to impress upon all of our readers and their friends that if any one should feel dissatisfied in the slightest degree with the magazine he has chosen, we will cheerfully refund his money at once, on hearing from him. This applies to any of the magazines ordered through us.

Owing to a general increase in the cost of production, the year has been a "testing time" for many publications, and a considerable number have raised their subscription price. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is exceptional in the fact that it has made steady gains in popularity, and is to-day more widely read than at any previous period of its history. It has given, during 1911, a larger paper than ever before, with an aggregate increase of 400 columns of reading matter over 1910. There will be no increase in the subscription price, which will remain at $1.50.

Finally, as you well know, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its management have at heart always the best interests of its readers. Hence we are encouraged to believe that all who read this notice will regard it as a personal letter and will assist us by sending in their renewals promptly—a service which we will value very highly indeed.

Sensible Prison Reform

MANY American State prisons and penitentiaries are run on what is known as the convict contract system. It is a system that affords the amplest opportunities for official graft, and in most cases the entire profits go into the pockets of the contractors instead of the taxpayers. Many attempts have been made to do away with this pernicious system of exploiting prison labor, but they have usually failed. Convict products have been put into the market in competition with free labor; but corrupt influences have generally succeeded in stifling investigation. Detroit has a prison which is an illustration of successful management without convict contracts. The Detroit House of Correction takes no contracts, does not compete with free toilers and annually pays to the city of Detroit a profit of many thousands of dollars, which is divided among the families of prisoners, or carried to the credit of the prisoners themselves. In thirty-two years, this prison has turned over more than $1,000,000 in profits for the purposes named. Its experience would seem to be a complete refutation of the familiar claim that prison labor cannot be made self-supporting under prison management exclusively. Another important consideration is that the system which produces such results is the strongest inducement to good behavior and docility among its inmates, who are thus made sharers in the fruits of their own industry.

That Dynamite Menace

WHETHER the twenty-one sticks of dynamite, which were discovered by the merest accident on the El Capitan bridge, about the time President Taft's special train was due, were placed there by careless workmen or by some plotters who had the villainous design of wrecking the train, is not yet made clear. The Presidential special crossed the bridge early on Monday morning, October 16. A little earlier, according to the statements of the railway employees, a Mexican bridge-walker discovered a suspicious person on the bridge and fired upon him, but the presence of the explosive, it seems, was not actually disclosed until after the train had passed over. There it was, with fuse attached, and the quantity was sufficient to have blown off both abutments. We trust that investigation may rob the affair of its criminal aspect, although the mere presence of dynamite on such an occasion carries an ominous suggestion. The President is having a great time on his 17,000-mile vacation trip, with alternate leaps from the land of sunshine to realms of frost and snow. Nothing, not even the peril of dynamite, seems to interfere with his running schedule. He is to be heartily congratulated on his escape from what might have been a very real danger. It is now hardly expected in Washington that he will return before the latter part of November, when he will find plenty of accumulated official business piling up in preparation for the approaching session of Congress.

China's Revolution

BEGINNING in Szechuen and spreading with remarkable rapidity throughout Central China, the revolutionary movement in the ancient empire seems quite likely to assume formidable proportions. Its object is the overthrow of the Manchu dynasty, and as the present government has proved exceedingly unpopular among the common people in many provinces, the movement will doubtless spread far beyond its present limits before it is finally suppressed. City after city in the heart of the empire has passed under rebel control. The uprising is in some respects like the Sepoy mutiny in India fifty years ago, which carried with it large bodies of troops well supplied with arms and ammunition. The return of Yuan Shi Kai to power means that the government has resolved on drastic measures, and unless there is a widespread disaffection among the imperial troops, we may soon expect to hear of hard fighting.

It is impossible to forecast the future of China, should the present revolutionary movement succeed. Some of the leaders in the rising have been quoted as declaring that the ultimate aim is the establishment of a republic. This may prove little more than an ambitious dream, for the reversal of China's long centuries of monarchical rule would be one of the greatest of modern miracles. Her empire is so vast and the unrest so widespread that the revol

California's Panama Exposition Started

ON October 14 President Taft lifted a spade of earth in the Golden Gate Park in San Francisco and started work on the Panama Pacific International Exposition, which the Californians say is to surpass anything of the kind ever held. Ground was broken within the confines of the stadium built by the city, which will form one of the central points of the exposition. Appropriate exercises were held. One hundred and fifty thousand people faced the President as he spoke, the largest audience, Mr. Taft said, he had ever addressed. The weather was so hot, and the press of the crowd so great, that one hundred men and women fainted and had to be taken to hospitals. Mme. Lillian Nordica assisted in the opening exercises by singing "The Day's at the Spring," and by leading the great assemblage in singing "The Star-spangled Banner." Her greeting was almost as enthusiastic as that given the President. An important feature of the exposition will be a massive tower and memorial erected at San Francisco overlooking the Pacific Ocean. From the floor of its base to the top of the great figure of Victory surmounting the shaft, the tower will be 850 feet in height, making it the tallest building perhaps in the New World. It is to be of steel and concrete. The exterior will be covered with marble. The base will be 320 feet square and 120 feet high. At the top of the base will be a frieze 20 feet high, which will picture in relief such events as the discovery of gold, the coming of the pioneers, the building of the first and other railroads to the coast, the acquisition of territory and trade in the Orient, and the opening of the Panama Canal. These scenes are to be executed by the most distinguished sculptors. There are to be four elevators running to the top of the tower, from which glorious views of the fair, the city and the ocean can be seen. The tower is to cost $1,500,000, to be furnished by popular subscription. If necessary the tower can be used as a meteorological observatory, a wireless telegraph station, and for lighthouse purposes, sending light out 100 miles to sea. The opening of the Panama Canal will be one of the most momentous events of the centuries. It will indicate the best that human engineering, industry, enterprise and wealth can do, and the event, which is a national one, will be fittingly commemorated by the Californians who, before the shocks of the earthquake had subsided, were clearing away the rubbish of the ruins to rebuild a more glorious metropolis. The opening of the gateway that shall make the Atlantic and Pacific one, through which ships of commerce will go on errands of fabulous wealth, will furnish a new channel through which the heart of the West may flow to that of the East, in the passionate desire for the souls of brother men, most of whom have their homes on the shores of the Pacific. The exposition and its tower are the material expressions of the gigantic enterprise which means so much to international progress and universal brotherhood. Early in the history of the race stone pillars were used as memorials of important events. The one by Laban and Jacob was to indicate peace and good will.

And Laban said to Jacob, Behold this heap, and behold this pillar, which I have cast betwixt me and thee; this heap be witness, and this pillar be witness, that I will not pass over this heap to thee, and that thou shalt not pass over this heap, and this pillar unto me, for harm. (Gen. 31: 51, 52.)

Broadway, New York, Blocked by Crowds Watching the Baseball Scores

NEVER since the days of the crowded stadia of Greece and Rome, where the populace gathered to see games and combats, have such throngs gone to view athletic contests, as have attended baseball games this year. In New York upward of 40,000 people were at some of the final games of the season. The interest of others is shown by this photograph. Baseball is a clean, manly sport, demanding steady nerves, prompt action and agility. The great regret in connection with it as our national sport is that sometimes games are played on Sunday. This, however, is not the case in the present national contest.

Heaviest Woman on Earth

Miss Gertrude Burk of Chicago, who is said to be the heaviest woman in the world, paid a visit to the home of Mrs. H. W. Hayes, of Alton, Ill. Miss Burk is twenty-two years of age and weighs 825 pounds. She is five feet seven inches in height. Some of her measurements are: Arm, 28 inches; waist, 54; bust, 75. She wears No. 4½ shoes and No. 7 gloves. Miss Burk weighed 15 pounds when she was born and at eight years of age the scales marked 250. Miss Burk sits down on two chairs facing each other and gets through an ordinary door only by turning sidewise. Persons who are abnormally large or small are subject to a great deal of notice and not a little embarassment and annoyance. We commend the refusal of Miss Burk to be exhibited as a curiosity in the dime show business. Her parents left her a comfortable support. The disposition upon the part of men and women to make money out of the spectacular or sensational circumstances of life is rebuked by the example of this young woman. This greed prompts many to turn into gold the notoriety for even the vices and crimes of life. A girl offered herself to the stage recently as a drawing card because she had figured as an interested party in a murder trial. Miss Burk is reported to be a young lady of intelligence and principle and not her physical weight but her character is the measure of her womanhood. Whether people be lean or fat, tall or short, heavy or light in weight, the size of the soul is that which counts. The development of a large soul by the power of Christ is thus described by the apostle:

Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. (Eph. 4: 13.)

Cadets Expelled for Drinking

Eight cadets at West Point were found to have smuggled liquors into their quarters, and to have become intoxicated upon them. They were tried and dismissed from the service. President Taft confirmed the sentence dismissing four of them and commuted the sentence of the other four, who are to suffer some kind of humiliation as a punishment. Whatever condemnation there should be of the use of intoxicants in the schools and colleges of the country, there should be especial condemnation of such use in government institutions such as West Point and Annapolis, where so much depends on the health of body, keenness of intellect and correctness of the morals of those who are to be the guardians of the nation. Emperor William of Germany in addressing his naval cadets advised them to take a pledge of total abstinence from all intoxicants, and he said to the officers of the army that he wanted the alcoholism of the German army to stop, and to stop at once. No nation can produce a finer set of cadets than those at West Point and Annapolis, and the punishment of the young men guilty of intoxication will be a guarantee that the high moral standards will be maintained. The action of the government in these dismissals also is one of the marks that indicate how high American public sentiment has arisen on the subject of drinking and intoxication. The example of one of the greatest statesmen and moral heroes of the world can be safely followed by the young men who are to be entrusted with large responsibility:

But Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, nor with the wine which he drank. (Dan. 1: 8.)

New Mariner's Compass

The gyroscopic compass is the newest invention for direction in sea navigation, and it is claimed that it is the best. A writer in a Paris publication says: "The gyroscope is a well-known instrument and few are ignorant of its two fundamental laws: first, that every gyroscope that is free to move in all directions tends to preserve its initial direction, and second, that if a gyroscope is free to move in only two planes it must at every point upon the earth's surface, except at the poles, tend to set parallel to the earth's axis and consequently indicate the absolute north. The equipment includes a principal compass provided with a transmitter and receivers electrically connected with it." The Anschutz gyroscope compass is used in the German Navy, and it is about to be adopted by the British Navy. The Chinese claim in their records to have discovered the mariner's compass 2634 B.C. Since 300 A.D. they have used it practically for sea navigation. The steel of the modern ships and other causes of magnetic disturbance and the march of scientific progress call for improvement. The old compass, which, since the twelfth century especially, has guided ships out of sight of land and when the moon and stars were hid and over oceans to the desired harbor, is to give place to the gyroscope compass, and in due time likely to something better than that. The Bible is the compass which points unerringly to Christ and will guide us through the darkness and storms and sea of life to the harbor, the home of the soul. This divine wisdom and guidance are promised in the Psalmist's words:

I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go: I will guide thee with mine eye. (Ps. 32: 8.)

Faces Death, Stops Plague

William D. Tippens, of Nashville, Tenn., connected with the Alaska boundary survey, reached Seattle the other day and told a thrilling tale of heroism in the far North, hundreds of miles north of the Arctic Circle. Smallpox became epidemic in the Indian village at Rampart House. Most of the natives fled, leaving a hundred or more victims to die. Thomas Riggs, Jr., of Washington, D. C., chief of the American party in the Alaska boundary survey, courted death for a long period in nursing, vaccinating and enforcing health regulations in the country. By thus really taking his life in his hand he kept down the rate of mortality among those afflicted to a normal figure, and by his intelligence, courage and constancy he stamped the plague entirely out. It is the duty of the Christian to address himself to the cure of the body. Christ did so, and so instructed his apostles. They did not stop at the physical cure, but looked through it to the cure of the soul. The ministry of Paul to physical and spiritual disease is thus referred to:

And the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them. (Acts 19: 12.)

CONGRESS SEEKS ADVICE ON FINANCE

THE National Monetary Commission, which was recently appointed at Washington to consider and report to Congress on the feasibility of the plan advocated by Senator Aldrich for the creation of a National Reserve Association, is conducting its researches through a sub-committee. This sub-committee held a two-day hearing at the Hotel Plaza in New York on October 16 and 17.

They were then addressed by Professor Edwin R. A. Seligman of Columbia University, who expressed himself as heartily in favor of the proposed association. He declared it in accord with economic principles long advanced by the ablest thinkers of the country, that it would tend to divert the country's reserve fund from Wall Street to the real business interests, and that it would enable the banks of the country to participate in the profits of international banking business. The committee is composed of Congressmen Edward B. Vreeland of New York, Chairman; Senator Boies Penrose, Pennsylvania; ex-Senator Julius C. Burrows, Michigan; Congressman John W. Weeks, Boston; Congressman George Prince, Illinois, and ex-Congressman Robert W. Bonynge, Colorado. The committee will hold hearings in Chicago, St. Paul, Minneapolis, Seattle, Portland (Ore.), San Francisco, Salt Lake City, Denver, Omaha, and St. Louis. This tour, which ends on November 12, may be supplemented with another among Southern cities. The Commission will report to Congress about January 8. The hearings have consisted chiefly of discussions by bankers and business men of the Aldrich plan for a National Reserve Association of fifteen branches throughout the country, with a representative directorate of nine or more. The organization would give greater security to bank depositors and discourage speculation.

TWO LITTLE KOREAN MAIDS

MISSIONARY MALCOLM C. FENWICK, pastor of the Church of Christ at Wonsan, Korea, writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD giving several interesting incidents from his recent missionary experiences. He tells the story of two young Korean girls, one of whom (Rebecca) had a narrow escape from marrying a heathen. Missionary Fenwick writes:

"Rebecca was fourteen years of age. She was harassed by her older sister urging her to marry an unbeliever; but steadfastly she refused. Her father, who was an earnest Christian, had become an evangelist and was away from home most of the time. The annexation of Korea caused an enormous revival of early marriages. Matchmakers were scouring the country far and near, seeking husbands for young girls, so fearful were their parents that they would be forced to marry Japanese husbands. Daughters were engaged as young as five years, and I have heard of one little widow of seven.

"Under such circumstances, Rebecca was importuned to marry an unbeliever. Her protests were in vain, and the preliminary contract was made. Rebecca had read in her Bible, 'Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers,' and she resolved to obey God's Word at any cost. Saving up her Korean pennies until she had five hundred of them, she spent a day in fasting and prayer. The following day she donned a suit of her brother's clothes, and saying to his women folks that she was going to where God led her, and if he was pleased to bring her to a place of safety she would write, otherwise they would know she was dead, she started. She passed as a boy, and made her way to Pastor Sen's in three days, walking eighty miles. He found her in a pitiful condition—one shoe and stocking off, a foot blistered and the skin worn off, and the girl hardly able to hobble another step. In his study she said: 'I am Rebecca. I left home because they had contracted to marry me to an unbeliever.' She was provided with comfortable quarters, clothes and food, but was too tired and sore to eat. When her brother, who really loved his sister, returned home and found she had gone, he became frantic with alarm and grief. He immediately set out in the night, and after much travel, he traced her to Pastor Sen's and to his great joy found she was safe. When he heard her story from Pastor Sen he said: 'Of a truth, God has guided and sustained my sister. This is none other than his grace. I know now why she prayed all day and refused to eat. She is yours. Take her and train her for him.'

"One of Mrs. Fenwick's Bible women was very unhappy. Enquiry elicited the fact that before the Gospel had reached her, she and her husband had sold their little daughter to a Korean nobleman as a slave. I was sent with the father to redeem her. He carried the price of his daughter's redemption. The nobleman was at that time a member of the royal cabinet, as minister of foreign affairs. I was cordially received; but when my errand was made known, the great man was disagreeably surprised, and, not wishing to surrender his slave, argued long and strenuously. 'Why, your country has slaves!' he said. 'No,' I replied. 'I'm a Canadian.' 'Well, they have slaves in the United States!' said he. 'No,' the people set them all free; just as your king did so nobly recently.' That staggered him a bit, so I pressed the point. Getting in the father of the little girl, I had him lay down the price of her redemption in front of the owner. 'Now,' I said, 'Your Excellency knows that it has always been the law of Korea that a slave can be redeemed any time by paying back the original purchase price. Furthermore, after his Imperial Majesty made treaties with other Powers, he graciously abolished slavery in his domain. Your Excellency is a minister of the Crown, appointed to uphold the decrees of his Majesty. I, therefore, call upon you to obey his decree, and to receive the money according to ancient law, and hand over the girl to her father.' 'Irionera!' [come here] he loudly called. Immediately an attendant stepped forward. 'Bring the slave!' he ordered. The girl was brought. 'Please have her taken away,' he said to me. Great was the rejoicing when we returned. The liberated slave is now a member of a Christian boarding school."

Persia and Womanhood

THAT must have been an amusing scene in the Persian Medjliss, or Congress, when a champion of the new womanhood arose the other day to plead its cause, amid the scores of blind adherents to the old order. When the Medjliss was quietly discussing the bill for the next election, and had reached the clause which states that no woman shall vote, Vakil el Rooy mounted the tribune and declared roundly that as women possessed minds and souls, they should possess votes!

The Congress was struck dumb with horror. Does not the Koran expressly declare that women have no souls? As for minds, did not every member present know of his own knowledge that it was preposterous to ascribe even a spark of intellect to women! Little by little, the Medjliss recovered itself enough to roundly reprimand the Hadji Vakil for his wild presumption. The doctrine that women had minds and souls was so revolutionary that the very foundations of Islam would be rent asunder if it were known that a Hadji of Vakil's standing had advanced it.

Woman's Work for Women is authority for the statement that Christian missionaries receive requests constantly from Moslem parents, that their boys may be taken into the missionary boarding-schools, in order that these boys may be removed from their "home influences"! Therefore a "home" was started for them. This contained 66 inmates in 1900. Now there are 348. One of the chief elements in their teaching is respect for womanhood, so that when these educated boys and others from other schools go forth into active life, there will probably be many members of the Persian Congress, instead of a single one, to combat the Mohammedan postulate that women have neither minds nor souls.

Equal Pay for School Teachers

AFTER an agitation of several years, the women teachers of New York have at last won their fight for equal pay for both sexes in the public schools. This will add $3,500,000 to the annual metropolitan budget. The bill for equal pay has passed the State Legislature several times, but until now has invariably been vetoed. In some New York school grades, the women teachers already have equal pay with the men, and there are many large cities throughout the country where uniform compensation for both sexes is the rule. The increase to the New York taxpayers will be four mills on the dollar. While the result of the campaign will be to give higher pay to the women teachers now in commission, it will probably be the means of opening the way for the appointment of a larger number of men teachers, who will be chosen for certain grades the more readily that pay will now be equal for both sexes. In other words, it will now be a question of absolute fitness in deciding appointments instead of being one largely of economy or favoritism as formerly.

PAST AND PRESENT IN TRIPOLI

An Oasis Home in Tripoli

A Typical Street in the City

Going Home from the Market

As soon as the startled world could recover from the shock of the sudden declaration by Italy of war upon Turkey for the possession of Tripoli, it began to ask, "Why should Italy want this desert province? Is it worth anything like the blood and gold that she must expend to get it?"

For after leaving the coast, one can go but a short distance inland before he traverses the unrelieved desert. Sand is everywhere. What does Italy want with this vast expanse of sand?

It is true that once here stood flourishing cities. That great merchant-nation, the Phœnicians, doubtless founded a civilization here back in the dim past. Then the Carthaginians held it. At the famous battle of Zama, the Romans wrested from them the sovereignty of the whole Mediterranean, and over Rome "Tripolitania" (its Roman name) probably attained her highest prosperity. Through the energy of that wonderful nation, irrigation was established, great aqueducts were built, and agriculture and stock-raising were effectively promoted. The Emperor Septimius Severus was a native of Tripoli, and during his reign granted the state the privileges of the Jus Italicum. In gratitude for this favor, the Tripolitanians sent their emperor yearly an enormous gift of olive oil. So great was the quantity, that after Severus died there was enough of the Tripoli oil on hand in his storehouses to supply Italy for the ensuing years. Let us hope that its sweetness was somehow retained during that long period.

The olive groves are now gone. As Rome's power declined, first the Byzantines, and then the wild tribes of the inland deserts, gradually won away its African possessions; the aqueducts were broken down; petty wars took the place of peaceful labor; and little by little Tripoli sank into her present low condition. Doubtless climatic changes have helped on her degradation. One who sees the noble castle-ruins and grand broken arches still visible here and there in the interior, among the drifting sands, cannot help feeling that a great tragedy of nature has been enacted here, and that to its agency a large part of Tripoli's fall has been due.

Can Italy resuscitate agriculture in this land? Mining experts have reported unfavorably upon her mineral resources. Along what avenues does Italy expect to derive any profit there?

The Crowd in a Tripolitan Market Place During an Annual Festival

As for Tripoli, with its veiled women, its lawless Bedouin rangers, its scanty wealth, its dwindling commerce, what patriotic ardor can be expected there? Steeped in the lethargies of Mohammedanism, sensual, illiterate, and bowing in servile submission to the irresistible Fate which decrees their joy or woe, what can they contribute to enhance the glory of Italy?

One of the most discouraging features of life in Tripoli, as in other Mohammedan countries, is the condition of these veiled, fatalistic women. Those of the richer classes live in untutored idleness; the poor, in even more ignorance and constant, ill-directed drudgery. A missionary, for whom the wife of a muleteer was preparing supper, noticed that she set aside in a furtive way a small part of the tea and sugar.

"Why do you do that?" was asked.

"Oh," said the woman, "I must provide against the day when my husband may divorce me."

She then made the startling announcement that she was her husband's sixth wife, and that he was her sixth husband.

Of course, no home life can exist under such circumstances. All of our missionaries in Mohammedan countries testify that, as among the pagans, they depend upon the beautiful object-lesson of the peaceful Christian home to enforce their Gospel teaching. Many who resist all other appeals, when they are admitted into the sacred precincts of the missionary's happy home, respond to its irresistible charm and turn to Christ. Let us hope that the Mohammedanism of Tripoli may be subjected to such influences until it takes its place among progressing nations. If Italy can bring this to pass, her apparent blunder may ultimately be forgiven by the world.

Questions and Answers

J. B. N., Atlantic, Ia. 1. In a recent sermon by Mr. Moody, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, he says: "If there is any danger of your getting out of his kingdom, he will try to get somebody to whisper in thought and heart that you are not a Christian." What did Mr. Moody mean by this? 2. Is the "new birth" conversion? How may a person know that he or she has been born again? 3. Some Christians say that they can't tell the time or place they were converted.

1. He meant to caution his hearers against the wiles of Satan, who loves to keep men in his power and who would "deceive the very elect." 2. Yes, being born again is conversion. See Jesus' statement to Nicodemus (John 3: 1-21). 3. It is undoubtedly true that many persons cannot fix the time at which they began the Christian life. Some began it in childhood, almost at their mother's knee; others in Sunday School, etc. In many cases it is a slow realization; in others, an instantaneous operation, where the individual realizes the error of his ways and turns to Christ as Saviour and in his strength begins that hour to live a new life.

G. C. S., Philadelphia. I noticed an article in the August number of a New York magazine on "What is to become of the preacher." There were a good many misstatements in this article and an answer to them ought to be given the broadest kind of circulation. It seems to be quite the fashion to circulate these misstatements in regard to Foreign Mission work. The cost of administration of Foreign Mission funds in the United Presbyterian Church is four and one-tenth cents to the dollar; the Presbyterian cost is just seven cents, I think; the Baptist is twelve cents: but the Baptists spend a great deal of money very wisely on educational work through their literature. This, I believe, is charged to Foreign Mission administration expenses. Even the United Presbyterians with four and one-tenth cents for administration include eight-tenths of a cent for publication to get the dollar and five-tenths of a cent because the dollar does not come in time. Other expenses of getting the money are included and it is altogether probable that not over two cents are spent in actual administration and two and one-tenth cents in publication, educational work and paying interest on the money they don't get.

Your question relative to the magazine article on "What is to become of the preacher?" interests us; and in view of recent developments the suggestion occurred to us that the preacher might very well retort by asking "What has become of the magazine?" The article is distorted, whether purposely or not, we cannot say; at all events, it is certainly misrepresenting the actual facts and is an injustice to foreign missions and missionary boards. Still, when we consider the fact that almost all critics of this adverse class are found outside of the churches, and not within them, and are consequently less reliably informed than they should be, these attacks become unimportant. The sworn annual report of every board of missions, home and foreign, shows just what proportion of the funds is spent in administration, and they are all conducted on economical and satisfactory lines.

G. M. S., Mansfield, O. Kindly inform me if it is true that Moses wrote part of the Psalms. I have heard this, and wish to ask you for your opinion.

The Book of Psalms (which is the Psalter of the Hebrews) has many authors, the principal one being David. Some are attributed to Hezekiah, Josiah, and Zerubbabel, two (the 72d and 127th) to Solomon, several to the Levites and the Asaphites, one, at least, to Jeduthun, eleven to the sons of Korah, one to Ethan (Psalm 89), while many are of uncertain authorship. Moses is given by tradition as the author of Psalm 90, being the only contribution of which his authorship is reasonably certain. The Psalms cover a period of a thousand years. They were composed at different remote periods, by various poets; David, the most prolific contributor, being indicated as the author of seventy-three Psalms in the Hebrew text and eleven in the Septuagint. There are no data for answering your second question. The Bible in many places warns us against indulgence in strong drink.

H. E. M., Colby, Kan. 1. How may a person understand that he is accepted of God? 2. How can one be fully persuaded that there is a God, when he has no consciousness of his existence? 3. Please explain what is meant by the "personal companionship" of Christ. 4. When seeking for the truth, should one seek to practise faith without sight, or should he rather endeavor to settle all questions by careful thought and study?

1. Read Romans, 5th and 6th chapters, which comprehensively answers your question. Also I. John, 3d chapter. 2. We, with our limited finite intelligence, cannot grasp infinity; yet all men, whether they are believers or not, are conscious of the existence of a Higher Power, which guides and controls the universe. 3. It is where we "walk with Christ" in the sense of having constant communion by prayer, by counsel, by receiving strength and guidance from him, by making his will our will, by becoming all things to all men for his sake, by subjecting our daily acts to the test, "What would Jesus do?" that we realize this companionship. "If a man love me," said the Master, "he will keep my words; and my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him" (John 14: 23). 4. Faith without sight is the true form of faith; that which demands demonstration is not faith but doubt. "Blessed are they which have not seen and yet have believed" was the rebuke to Thomas (John 20: 29).

J. W., Magnolia Springs, Fla. 1. The orthodox belief in regard to the essentials of the Christian religion is stated in the creeds of the evangelical churches and includes belief in a future life, heaven and a place of future punishment. 2. The questions concerning Jonah and the miracle of the sun and moon at Ajalon have both been discussed in THE MAIL-BAG in a recent issue. 3. The words "the kingdom of God is within you" are to be interpreted in the sense that those who follow Christ and believe in him as Saviour, and whose lives are guided by his example, have already in this life a part and share in his kingdom, which is eternal. There are many books on the subject of the Christian life which you will find helpful, among them After Death—What? which quotes all the authorities on the subject.

Reader, North Carolina. Can a person who has committed a heinous sin expect to be pardoned? It is said that Jesus is "able to save to the uttermost," but I cannot get peace or pardon. Please explain "sinning away the day of grace." When Jesus says, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out," then will he cast me off?

Yes; such a one has the assurance of pardon if he comes truly penitent, confesses Christ, and asks forgiveness. Remember the promise in John 6: 37, also Matt. 10: 32; Luke 12: 8; Acts 10: 43. There are many other passages showing that there is pardon for all who earnestly seek it. But having sought and accepted it, you must have faith to take God at his word, never doubting. As to your "day of grace" having passed, you may be assured it has not, for your present condition of mind proves that the Spirit is still striving with you, to lead you to Christ. See John 15: 7 and also verse 16.

W. S. H., Stamford, Neb. I am a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD although, I think, not a Christian, perhaps, although compelled to believe. I am a poor farmer in southwestern Nebraska; but we have a good atmosphere out here, free from much of the vice of the city. Nearer to nature brings us nearer to God. I have often wondered why I was brought here when a child from the heart of an Eastern city, to toddle around after the quail, to hear the drumming of the prairie chicken, and the curious cry of the coyote. Why is it we love to live here, year after year, and to battle on with drought and disappointments? I know it makes you Easterners smile; but we love these homes. Why is it?

The desire for a home of one's own, the joy of sowing and reaping in your own field, living under your own roof—these are feeli as old as the human race and are implanted all of us. You remember that beautiful p sage in Genesis 2: 8 about God's garden, verse 15, which shows that the first man an agriculturist. Every man has the old of the soil in his heart, and it makes itself wherever he builds his dwelling and surrou himself with his loved ones. Where his ho is his heart is, and that is his earthly Eden, as you have found yours in Nebraska.

M. P., Shattuck, Minn. 1. Why did Jesus Matt. 10: 30, charge the two blind men tell no man, and also, in Mark 3: 12, also charged those freed from uncle spirits not to make it known? 2. Af Luther was converted, to what church he belong?

1. In his ministry, he was frequently beset the multitudes crowding about him in the pu lic places so that they impeded his work. T Jewish officials took advantage of this kind publicity to persecute him. It is inferred th he desired to avoid this, and therefore cou seled those who were healed to go away quiet that his work might not be interrupted. The Protestant church. The division into diff ent denominations came afterward.

R. S. R., Swift Current, Sas. Two men discussing Bib questions differed widel One claimed that he w not required to believe ar part of the Bible he cou not understand, while t other willingly believ what he could not unde stand. It was agreed submit the question to T MAIL-BAG.

Faith has been defined "the substance of things hope for, the evidence of things n seen" (Heb. 11: 1); it is tha operation of the soul in whic we are convinced of the exis ence and truth of somethin that is not before us, or per ceptible to the human sense Every one entertains faith some kind, which he would fin it difficult if not impossible t demonstrate by visible mean It is the practice of faith—th voluntary exercise of it—whic enables us to rise to the belie in those great truths whic God has been pleased to reve Paul says that "we walk b faith, not by sight" (II. Co 5: 7). Jesus himself sai (John 20: 29), "Blessed ar they that have not seen an yet have believed." Thus while believing what we se and comprehend may have it merits, believing what is n seen and but dimly comprehended is a greate merit. There are many things in nature whic we believe, yet without being able to fully grasp them with our minds; we believe becaus we have the evidence of others, though not o our own senses. The faith which simply be lieves what it can see, understand, define and demonstrate is not real faith at all. "No man hath seen God at any time," yet all men believe in a God. The things of the spiritual world cannot be demonstrated by mere material agencies, but only through spiritual agencies. The exercise of faith increases our spirituality, enables us to comprehend things which without such exercise would be incomprehensible. Paul said that to the learned Greek skeptics the Gospel was "foolishness." Pride of intellect is one of the greatest barriers to spiritual growth.

Gathering Pineapples Near Rangoon, Burma

IF THE actual figures of the fruit industries of the world for this year could be set before us they would be truly astonishing when compared with those of twenty-five years ago. America, though perhaps the greatest consumer of fruit, is closely seconded by a number of other countries. To satisfy this growing demand great areas, not only of our own land, but of many others, are being annually devoted to fruit-culture. We supply ourselves with apples, pears, peaches and oranges, besides sending great quantities to Europe; but for many of the tropical fruits, such as the banana and the pineapple, we must go to other lands. The annual production of pineapples in Florida and California is steadily growing, but Hawaii is rivaling both in quantity and quality. The introduction of the pineapple into Burma, British India, is one of the most recent developments, and has met with splendid success. Each year sees a larger production of the fruit and an increased number of people employed in the industry.

Miscellaneous

J. J. F., Ironton, Ala. It is not known whether Paul was married, although it is surmised that he was not.

G. N. F., Stowe, Vt. The Authorized Version continues to be the choice of the people; hence there are more copies of it printed every year. In all essentials the two versions are the same.

J. C., Chapman, Neb. 1. "Sins of commission" are the acts we do wrongfully, and which carry a moral and spiritual responsibility; "sins of omission" are the things we leave undone which we ought to have done. Good Suggestions in the Cozy Corner

"I Made It Myself"

IN THE recent "I Made It Myself" contest Edith Bott's charming Memorandum Book for Addresses, Engagements and Birthdays, neatly and artistically made of eggshell paper, letter paper and tiny silk cord, with a spray of forget-me-nots painted in water color on the cover, deserves special honorable mention.

Eva Jennings' Old-Fashioned Garden is brilliant and beautiful with violet-runner, dahlias, asters, chrysanthemum, marigold, sweet-william, phlox, foxglove, golden glow and the sweet herbs, thyme, lavender, taragon, fennel, sage and winter savory, because just at this time a year ago she intelligently planned that it should be, and has made friends with her flowers and cared for them the way that most little girls care for their dolls, is a worthy prize winner (a gunmetal watch). It adds for the benefit of Cozy Corner boys and girls who may want to start a garden:

Plant Fall Bulbs

THE time to plant snowdrops, crocus, tulip, hyacinth, single narcissus and many other varieties of flowering bulbs is in early November. Mix clay with sand, gravel and loam; the bulbs will then thrive well in. For a special tulip bed to be in bloom in April, spade up the earth to a depth of eighteen inches, put in a layer of loose stones, then add three or four inches of gravel and about three inches of sand well mixed. The bed treated in this manner will insure good drainage. About Thanksgiving cover the bed with stable manure or leaves inches at least of dry leaves to protect the bulbs from the cold. This will prevent the bulbs from freezing. In the spring the rain will sink the manure or the juice from the dead leaves into the earth and make it rich for the early growing and blooming of the flowers.

Snowdrop and Crocus

BE SURE to plant plenty of snowdrop and crocus bulbs on the lawn where they will come up first thing in the spring. Few weeds make much headway after October, and this is the main reason why bulbs planted at this time will be in their height of bloom in March, April and early May before the summer weeds are strong enough to draw the ground.

A Home-Made Aquarium

TOM GILDING, of one of our older boys, tells of an aquarium he has recently made in a large glass fruit-jar. "Put an inch of sand, spread evenly to hold the roots of a few water plants, such as common madela and duckweed, by means of which the necessary oxygen for the fish is provided and the carbonic which is thrown off by the fish is absorbed. Then a layer of coarse gravel and a little heap of stones formed into arches where the fish may screen themselves from the light. The jar is kept three-quarters filled with water, which is changed regularly once a month. Several tadpoles, a fairy, the larvæ of stoneflies and dragonflies, a grub-worm or two, and three gold-fish, are the happy inhabitants of my aquarium. The water is kept at an even temperature, especially in the winter. Every few days, in addition to regular fish food, I put in tiny bits of raw beef. Over-feeding is dangerous, and everything depends upon the condition of the water in which my fish live. This I watch very carefully. If it is green, for example, I know that the light is too strong upon my fish, so I fasten a piece of gray tissue-paper around the side of the glass exposed directly to the sun, and add a few extra snails and tadpoles." This is a good suggestion, and there is a great deal of pleasure to be had from fitting up an aquarium and caring carefully for it. I should think many Cozy Corner boys and girls might follow the suggestion and have a nice aquarium for the winter.

Christmas Gifts for Little Sisters

MABEL THOMPSON'S Christmas dolls, three inches high, dressed in crocheted combination suits and frocks made of soft Saxony yarn, with little slippers and stockings to match, won a first prize, and is a nice suggestion for Christmas gifts for little sisters.

A Work Apron

LYDIA INGLES' Fancy-work Apron, with bags and pockets, and a dusting cap made of bright bandana kerchiefs, is an excellent suggestion for fair tables, and a prize-winner besides.

A Utility Bag

A NEAT little Bag made of a bit of flowered silk gathered on to an elliptical ring, with a cover neatly made of cardboard padded with the same silk and fitted inside the gathers on the ring, is especially convenient for the little odds and ends that one picks up at the last moment to put into a traveling bag when starting off on a journey.

Floyd Haden's Bow Kite, Ralph Zimmerman's Book Rack, and Charles Kinney's flight of Miniature Paper Gliders made after the models in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Cozy Corner Booklet (Good Time series No. 3), was an easy prize winner.

Nothing Too Good for Our Young People

"I MADE It Myself" contest and all other work recently done by Cozy Corner boys and girls show such fine spirit and averages so high that they inspire us in turn to keep the Cozy Corner up to the highest top-notch of what the very best Boys and Girls' Department in a very best Home Magazine like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD should be.

Nothing is too good for our young people. This is the motto of the Cozy Corner. So you see, my dear boys and girls, your interest in your own department is an excellent investment that is bringing you full and prompt returns.

Apple Jelly

MYRA SHELLING sends a nice recipe for apple jelly. Wash and prepare the fruit. Apples should be cored, not peeled. Put 2 quarts of the prepared fruit over the fire in a granite kettle; cover the contents with water and put over a hot fire. In jelly-making rapid boiling is necessary, since it causes the fruit to cook to pieces quickly. Crush the sauce with a glass bottle, put it in a bag and let it drain. For clear jelly do not press the pulp in the bag. If you want to get as much jelly as possible out of the fruit, however, press the bag, for even apples pressed hard will yield good-looking jelly if they have not been allowed to cook too long. Now measure the juice, put it over the fire, and bring it to the boiling point; then measure an equal quantity of sugar into a granite bread pan; stand it in the oven long enough to allow the sugar to become thoroughly heated but not melted. When the apple juice has boiled just twenty minutes add the hot sugar to it. One minute before taking it from the fire, allow it to boil up, strain into jelly glasses, filling them full. This is an infallible recipe for excellent apple jelly.

Peppermint Discs

FOR peppermint creams rub fresh cream and confectioner's sugar and three or four drops of peppermint flavoring to a stiff, smooth paste, and roll it thin, and cut out little discs with a ring or a thimble. Some people cover these round little peppermint drops with chocolate filling and serve them after dinner with little cups of coffee.

MARY RILEY, age 11.

A Nice Sweetmeat

IF YOU cut orange peel into small slivers and let them boil in melted granulated sugar for about ten minutes and then take it out and when it is cool sprinkle it with coarse granulated sugar you will have some delicious candied orange peel.

EDITH LYSLE, age 9 1-2.

Millions in Answer to Prayer

ONE of the institutions I determined to visit on my last visit to England was the Muller Orphan Homes near Bristol. I had read of these Homes, and heard them cited as a practical proof of answered prayer, and I wanted to know them first hand.

My desire was fulfilled in due course, though not fully; for I soon realized that such an institution cannot be comprehended in all it means in a hurried visit. But my visit did this for me: it gave me a vital personal interest in that work, which watches with keen anticipation for further news about it.

As Seen by the Visitor

The Homes consist of five large stone buildings, each several stories high, severely simple in design, and capable of accommodating 296, 390, 440, 434 and 440 boys and girls respectively. The location on Ashley Down is healthy and inspiring, but the grounds around and between the buildings are turned to utilitarian rather than ornamental uses, potatoes being cultivated where lawns might be. Indoors, the same ascetic impression possesses you.

And the children! The girls look so old-fashioned in their uniforms—straw poke bonnets, long dark capes. But this is only a superficial criticism, and George Muller was never superficial. He was doing business with God, and neither in his own life nor in his institution was there any waste. His Homes were built to last (No. 1 was opened sixty-two years ago). The big windows make bright, airy rooms. The clothes are healthy and adequate. There are playgrounds and playrooms, a swimming pool and gymnasiums, gardens and toys. Christmas and other holidays are observed with appropriate cheer. The children are fed by faith, but not on faith. They are happy—far happier than they could ever hope to be in their old conditions. Judged by the development of the boys and girls in the Homes, and their success in after life, Mr. Muller's methods stand approved, as far as they profess to go.

Seventy-five years ago last February 5, George Muller received the first orphans into a private house in Bristol. That little family has grown to 13,459! The money received for their support, the erection of buildings, and other branches of activity, runs up to the stupendous total of over nine million dollars! What a modern miracle that so much money should be given freely and without solicitation, by people all over the world, to an obscure young man whom they had never seen, settled in a foreign land and building on a basis which many pronounced utterly visionary!

The work goes on in the same tried course, thirteen years after the founder's death, and enjoys continued success and blessing. Destitute orphans are received at any age from infancy up to seven years in the case of boys, and twelve in the case of girls. No financial, sectarian or other interest is required for admission. Boys are kept till they are fourteen, girls till sixteen or seventeen; so it often happens that children enjoy the benefits for a dozen years or more. The classroom education is elementary, but very thorough. The boys also do some out-door manual labor in the grounds, and are taught to knit their socks, make beds, clean shoes, scrub rooms. On leaving they are apprenticed to some business or trade of their own choosing, and thus given a start in life.

The girls are taught household duties, how to make their own clothes, etc. "We prefer fitting the girls for service to apprenticing them to business, as being generally far better for their bodies and their souls," says the "Narrative." But some are trained to be nurses and teachers. Many of the present staff of teachers and matrons are old students. The Bible is the only religious text-work used in the Homes, and it is a daily subject of study.

Besides the care of thousands of orphans several other forms of activity have been carried on by Mr. Muller and his successors. Last year eight day schools were supported, and five more assisted. Three of these are in England, seven in Italy, one in Spain, one in British Guiana and one in Ireland. All these schools are "conducted upon Scriptural principles," which means that all the teachers are believers, and that the Bible is the only source of religious instruction, and is daily taught in them. Fourteen Sunday Schools were also helped, attended by 1,457 children.

George Muller passed away in 1898. He named his son-in-law, James Wright, as his successor. Mr. Wright died in January, 1905. The care of the work then passed to the present director, George Frederic Bergin, who is in true succession to the founder in his motives and methods. Mr. Bergin has associated with himself his son, Dr. W. M. Bergin, so that without any board of trustees or other corporate arrangement the work goes on in the hands of men of prayer.

Will China Become a Republic?

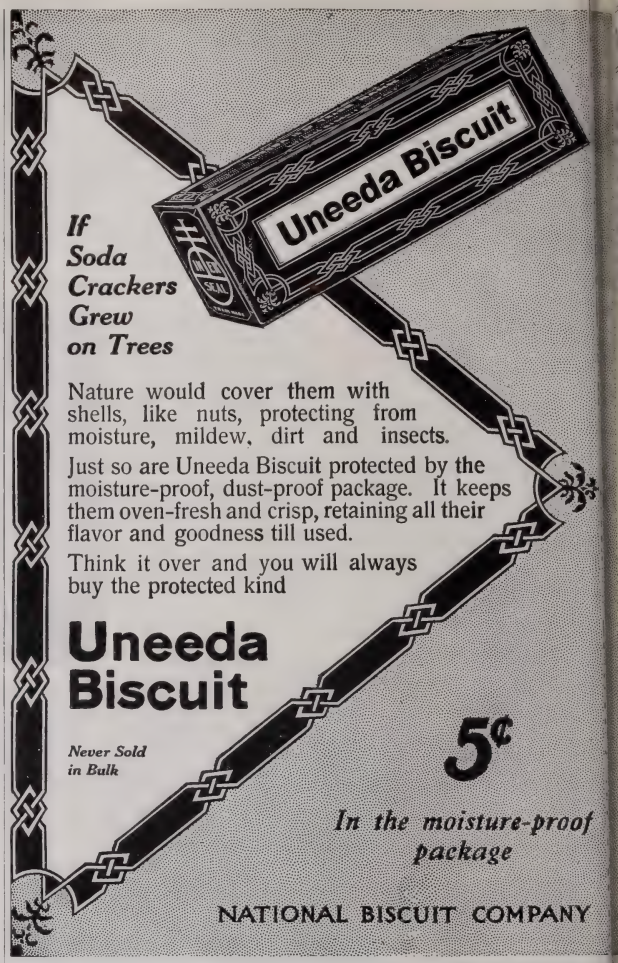
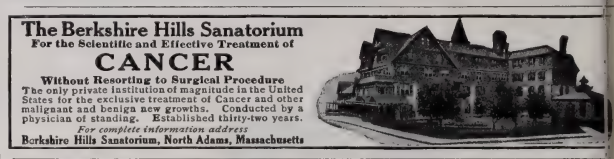
residents, and there was some sharp fighting in the streets with a Chinese mob. The Germans are presumably co-operating with the Japanese in forming an imperial landing corps for the protection of foreign interests. The Imperial Government will make a strong effort to recapture both Hankow and Wuchang, and troops are concentrating for that purpose. Japan will soon have a strong naval force on the Yangtse, and although the policy of the Mikado's government in dealing with the new crisis in China is yet undisclosed, it is very likely to prove a strong factor in determining the issues of the struggle.



China has lately negotiated a currency loan of $50,000,000, all of which will be devoted to carrying on the civil war.



China's empire, with an area of 4,500,000 square miles, has a population exceeding 400,000,000, or about one-third the entire population of the globe. The late Sir Robert Hart described them as "well-behaved, law-abiding, intelligent, economical and industrious." These qualities are characteristic of the whole race. An idea of the agricultural wealth of China may be gathered from the fact that it maintains a population four times as large as that of the United States. China could supply the world with coal for an indefinite period. When her internal resources are fairly developed, she will rank among the very foremost producing nations.

China has long been dissatisfied with her government. In a recent article in World-Wide Missions, the present situation is clearly set forth:

"The smouldering embers of national consciousness in China have burst into flame from Kirin to Canton, from Shanghai to the borders of Burma. It is so intense as at times to border on frenzy. Daily newspapers, circular letters, tracts, magazines and books are pouring from over-worked presses. Great mass meetings are being held. Parliaments are meeting in every provincial capital. There is but one question anywhere, What is best for the nation? How preserve national integrity, how strengthen the national defense, how develop the national resources?

The Death of Our Oldest Judge

ONE of America's oldest and most famous judges passed from the bench when Associate Justice John Marshall Harlan, of the Supreme Court of the United States, known as "The Great Dissenter," died at his home in Washington, D. C., on October 14. He was ill only five days from bronchitis. To the members of his family who were gathered about his bed he spoke his last words:

"Good-by. I am sorry I have kept you all waiting so long," he whispered.

Justice Harlan was the oldest member of the Supreme Court, the most plain spoken and the most conspicuous. For years he has been regarded as one of the highest living authorities on the Constitution of the United States. Two of his greatest ambitions were not realized before his death. One was that he might become Chief Justice of the United States. When President Taft appointed Chief Justice White last December Justice Harlan put that ambition aside. He wanted to live until next June, that his service as a member of the highest tribunal might be longer than that of any man. He served thirty-three years ten months and twenty-five days.

The Late Justice John Marshall Harlan

Justice Harlan was in his seventy-eighth year, and the last few years there were many rumors that he would retire. He put them all to rest and continued to live an active life and retain his good health. He loved golf and golf stories and played the game with great enjoyment but not too prominent skill. He had no sympathy with the theory that a man became useless in his latter years, and he worked and played hard.

Nothing stirred him like the suggestion that he ought to retire. He could have done so at full pay eight years ago. Some of the candidates for his place thought he should have done so. Once there was talk of President Taft rewarding Luke Wright, of Tennessee, with an appointment to the court. A friend mentioned the retirement to Justice Harlan.

"Wright will hardly be appointed," he replied. "Fuller is not going to resign."

They passed to other topics and said good-night.

"You know," called Justice Harlan, half way across the street, as though it had been forgotten, "Fuller and I have decided that we will let them take us off feet foremost. Good-night."

Justice Harlan was appointed to the Supreme Bench by President Hayes. He had led the Kentucky delegation to the Republican National Convention in 1876, and at an opportune moment switched it from Bristow to Hayes, causing the latter's nomination and election. He was also a member of the commission which dealt with the contest between Tilden and Hayes for the Presidency.

He was born in Boyle, Ky., June 1, 1833.

A graduate of Centre College, Kentucky, as an A.B. in 1850, Judge Harlan began the study of law at Transylvania University and received his diploma four years later.

Beginning his legal practice in Frankfort, Justice Harlan soon became a power in politics in his section of the State. In 1858 he was elected county judge, and in the following year he was the Whig candidate for Congress from the Ashland district. He also served as Presidential elector on the Bell and Everett ticket.

In 1877 Justice Harlan went to Washington as a member of the Louisiana Commission, and while attending the sessions of the commission, on November 29, 1877, he was appointed as associate justice of the United States Supreme Court, and he began the discharge of his functions on December 10 following. He occupied his seat continuously until his death and was one of four, including Chief Justice Marshall, to serve on the Supreme Court Bench for more than thirty-three years.

Justice Harlan has been called the most prominent Presbyterian layman in the United States. The funeral services took place at the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, where he was an elder and the teacher of a Sunday School class. The pastor, the Rev. Wallace Radcliffe, officiated. The members of the Supreme Court did not hold their usual Saturday conference on the day of his death. The court met and adjourned on Monday until after the funeral, which was attended by all of the justices.

Among the Workers

—EVANGELIST J. WILBUR CHAPMAN sailed from New York September 23 for Europe, where he met his co-worker Charles M. Alexander, and on October 8 began evangelistic work in Belfast, Ireland. They will have the co-operation of the various denominations in the services which will continue for about six or seven weeks. Meetings will also be held in Lyne, England. The evangelistic party for the year is as follows: Dr. Chapman, Charles M. Alexander, Robert Harkness, E. W. Naftzger, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph C. Norton. The party will return to this country in December, and expect to sail for Australia about the middle of February.

—EVANGELIST J. B. PHILLIPS of Macon, Ga., and his singer, Miss Louise Herndon, have just closed a great revival campaign with Rev. T. E. Elgin, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Perry, Fla. The oldest citizens say they have never known such a religious awakening before. The results of the meeting are manifold. Christians of all denominations have been greatly revived, and seventy united with the church. Miss Herndon, a graduate of the Baptist Training School of Philadelphia, in addition to directing the two large chorus choirs, did great personal work among the ladies and young people. She is earnest, effective, and deeply consecrated. The ladies held prayer services daily all over the city. Evangelist Phillips preached three times each day—twice at the church and once to men at the court house.

—FOR SEVERAL YEARS Rev. R. C. Bowen, chaplain of the City Prison, Brooklyn, N. Y., has been in the habit of distributing religious papers among the prisoners in the Raymond Street jail. He writes: "Among the many I have found the influence and helpfulness of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD very noticeable in many ways. They tell me of the great comfort and help they receive in reading it, and frequently they save the copies to give to friends when they come to see them. Thus the good influence of your paper reaches even behind walls and gates, where it is a most welcome and helpful visitor."

THE PEACE-LOVERS

O H, WE trust this world is waking,
Moving towards a higher plane;
Weary of its wars degrading,
Hoping worldwide peace to gain—
May God grant it,
Blessed peace, that shall remain!

War is brutal! Peace angelic!
This admits of no dispute;
Better far to act the seraph
Than to imitate the brute.
Let war's cannons
Be henceforth forever mute.

Arbitration, let us seek it,
Talk it, boom it everywhere;
Press and pulpit labor for it;
Let not any one despair;
Work with courage,
'Tis already in the air.

War has had its valiant heroes,
And we pay them honors due;
Oh, may peace ne'er lack for leaders,
Nor for armies brave and true.
Crowns await them,
Garlands of the brightest hue.

WILLIAM H. PARMELEE.

THE LITTLE AND THE FRAIL

"O GOD," we cried, "this little child,
That goes to thee to-day,
Is still so young, so small, so frail,
How can she know the way?
The road is long; her little feet
Have never walked alone;
How can they find, mid thorn and brier,
The pathway to thy throne?"

"Dear suffering ones," the Christ-voice spoke
In accents fond and near,
"I, too, have known Gethsemane;
You need not doubt or fear.
Your little child will go with me;
She will not walk alone;
E'en as my arms close round, I feel
The clinging of your own.
There is no uphill road, no night,
No thorn or brier at all,
But only love and tenderness
For those so frail and small."

So warm the clasp, so strong the grasp,
So safe the heavenward trail,
Ah, who could fear, with Christ so near,
The little and the frail!

The Floods in Central Chin

REV. CLARENCE A. BURCH, the American Advent Missio Chao Hsien, writes to the CHRISTIA HERALD giving details of the gre Yangtse floods. He says: In 1901, t flood waters of the Yangtse reach the highest water-mark known f over sixty years, and at present th rising flood of waters has crept up within one inch of that record, ar bids fair to exceed it. Some of th higher dykes which kept out the wat in 1901 and it was hoped would do this year, were swept away on th 10th and 11th of August.

"The country is flooded fro Ichang to Shanghai; and from Ki kiang to Chinkiang the river is mo than a hundred miles wide in all but few places. The streets of Wuhu, th greatest rice-exporting port in th world, are from two to three feet un der water and the fields, which fro year to year have produced an enor mous export crop, have all bee flooded. The water has risen so hig that the dykes are entirely covered and boats can sail for a hundred mile back and forth through the country without obstruction. Throughout th low country the people long ago de serted their flooded homes and es caped to the mountains. Thousand are encamped on the hills about Wuhu and the number is being augmented every day.

"The viceroy at Nanking has dis patched a special commissioner t Wuhu. It is stated that this commis sioner has received eighty thousand taels from the government for relief work.

"The writer is stationed about sixty miles from Wuhu, in the midst of a district where the people have practically lost everything. Both our chapels are flooded to a depth of from one to three feet."

Do You Know Aunt Harriet?

Aunt Harriet is a wholesome, sensible, sympathetic woman. She has never read "Three Weeks" and she doesn't know the first thing about Bridge. But she does know a whole lot about running a home successfully, raising children creditably and living with a husband happily.

Aunt Harriet writes to three or four million readers every month through FARM JOURNAL—gives them good advice and helps to solve their problems and smooth their troubles.

Farm Journal holds quite as much of interest for women as for men—whether they live in the city or the country. It's a great home paper—full of valuable hints that make for economy of time and money in the conduct of household affairs.

Thoroughly practical, but not a bit dry. Clean to the core, but never preachy. 75,000 homes are sweeter and better for its monthly visits.

Farm Journal is, and always has been, unlike any other paper. To prove this, and to make Aunt Harriet's gentle acquaintance, send a dollar for a five years' subscription, and if at any time you are not satisfied with your bargain, just tell us and we will send back every cent of your dollar not yet used.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Late to Meals

ONG the little minor infelicities for which there is very slight ex-, that of being late to meals must eckoned. When a meal is an-ced every one who belongs to the ly should proceed to the table out undue delay. Tepid soup, a warm roast and vegetables that lost some of their flavor by ding are very annoying to the ekeeper who has done her best in r preparation. No doubt at times er is ready before one is ready to e a book, an outside task or the ing of a letter. There is just the chapter to be read, ten minutes e devoted to the wood pile, the cel-or the barn would finish something mplete, or the letter cut short in middle will not prove so interest-to the writer later on. All this owledged, the habit of dawdling meal-time instead of coming nptly to the dining-room is a bad it. Wives and mothers should vn upon it sternly.

he temptation to carelessness in special direction strongly assails s and girls who are on the street king with friends, lingering in s or returning from games, or in e manner are enthralled in en-ements while they fancy that it es little difference in the home tine whether they are punctual or reverse. Housekeeping proceeds h more smoothly when everybody cerned is prompt. Not only must eal be ready in season, but its ring away three times a day ser-ly invades somebody's time. Per-s it is mother's time, Sister Mary's e, or the time of the maid in the hen. If every one is punctual the es will be washed without unsea-able delay.

If You Were in the Pulpit?

you were in the pulpit instead of in the pew you would notice, be-se you could not help yourself, in-iduals in the congregation. You ld observe the woman who turns r the leaves of a hymn-book during sermon, or reads the church calen-with interest when she should be ening to you. Nobody could fur-ly or openly consult a watch, vn, fidget or whisper to a neighbor hout your being aware of it. The aker on a platform is often at the rcy of his audience. Apart from fact that we go to church for the rpose of worshiping God, the code good manners is violated if we are le and discourteous when we sit in pew. Thinking it over, if you ve ever behaved in your pew as you tainly would not behave in the in-course of business or the drawing-m of a friend, will you not for the e of good manners, good morals d the success of the preacher start a rsonal reform?

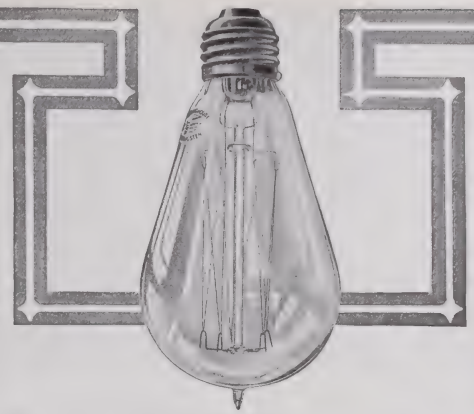
When Things Go Wrong



TAKE up your mind that things will go wrong now and then. There e days when fires do not burn. The rnace has been overhauled, the nge is in order, the flues are appar-tly safe and there is plenty of fuel, t the wind is in the east, the atmos-ere is fog-laden and the house is lly. There are days when the gro-r delivers your order at a neighbor's wn the street and you are delayed d the housekeeping is out of gear cause of his mistake. Other days me when you have made special ef-rts for the entertainment of an ex-cted visitor. You have set aside the table with the finest napery, taken down the best dishes, made lemon pie and plum cake. About the time when you are putting on your bonnet or your hat according to your age and taste, and looking out to see whether you need overshoes or may don your best wrap, a boy rushes in with a telegram. Your visitor is detained and will not arrive until day after tomorrow. Who cannot mentally make out a list of these trivial disappointments and trifling embarassments that for the moment rob life of flavor and send a shadow to the face? Ah, friend, it is when little things go wrong that you must not show the white feather. It is when there are tiny bits of discouragement that you must gird on your armor, be brave and wear a smiling face. Little trials are in the day's work, and we are very foolish if we suffer them to cloud the day, both because doing this lessens our energy and because, too, it shows ingratitude to the dear Father above who gives us so many things to be glad for and who sends the great sorrows at such wide intervals. Those who bear little trials cheerily will meet great ones victoriously.

How Do You Treat Your Grandmother?

NOT long ago a correspondent sent a letter to this page in which the statement was made that in certain localities in the West grandmothers were at present superfluous. In consequence, they were spirited away to Old Ladies' Homes where their declining years were supposed to be passed in comfort and luxury, or when this could not be done they were packed off to the poor-house. Long ago Will Carleton stirred our hearts to compassion by a vivid word picture entitled "Over the Hills to the Poor-House." To those of us who cherish the thought of the grandmother as an almost adorable figure, who think no home quite complete without her gentle presence, it is strange and inexplicable that she can ever be treated without consideration and affectionate kindness. The question, how do you treat your grandmother? has been suggested, not by a thought that you who read are perhaps not treating her well, but by the other thought that it may be you are over-doing the matter by so many attentions and so much watchfulness and solicitude that your grandmother feels herself hampered and in bondage. Nobody who reads this page can possibly be capable of injustice to the old. They have borne the burden and heat of the day, they have freely given their strength and their love in the days when they were bringing up their children, and very likely the second generation has been indebted to them for actual sacrifices and quick sympathies. Somehow the ideal grandmother understands young people in their teens and little children rather better than middle-aged people, fathers, mothers, aunts and cousins, in the midst of their preoccupations succeed in doing. In a New England village some years ago, an elderly lady dwelt in a cottage by herself. Her immediate descendants were asleep in the cemetery, but she was grandmother notwithstanding to the entire community. Everybody went to her to tell good news or bad, to receive advice, comfort or help. She had cookies and gingerbread for the children, she had leisure to listen to the older ones who dropped in upon her and, no doubt, often in her quiet hours she found time to carry the needs of her townspeople to the throne of the Most High. One day

The New STRONG Electric Lamp

THE greatest lamp yet is the new tungsten.

A bright, natural light. A much lower electric light bill. A strong "wire type" filament that will stand everything but positive abuse.

The Westinghouse Wire Type Tungsten Lamp

the lamp with the rugged "wire type" filament—was tried out in the severest kind of service for two full years before being given to the general public.

It uses less than a third the current taken by the carbon filament lamp. Unlike the carbon lamp, it never loses efficiency or uses more current as the lamp grows older.

Users of electric light will save money by giving some personal attention to lamps. No substitute can take the place of Westinghouse Tungstens. Notice particularly the seal marked "Westinghouse Tungsten" on each lamp.

All good electrical dealers sell these lamps. If you have any trouble getting them, we want to know it. We'll see that you are served.

Something about lamps worth knowing in our "Lamp Booklet." Send for a copy to "Westinghouse Lamp Dept. X, Bloomfield, N. J."

and remain presentable, but protected.

The "All-Round" has every good clothes-saving merit of a big, completely covering apron or working dress but, unlike either of these, gives the appearance of a nobby shirtwaist suit or dainty "Princess." It is a complete dress in itself, with the uses of four garments. Every woman needs one because it will give her so much real service at so little cost. It looks well, it fits well, and it goes on like a coat—just two clasps at the back and "Snap! and it's on."

Made of high grade washable percale, in gray and white nurse's stripe, black and white shepherd's check, blue polka dot, and light and dark blue chambray.

she passed away serenely as a gentle sunset, into the home beyond the sea. On the day of her funeral the schools were closed, every shop in town suspended business and from far and near there was a procession coming by twos and threes and larger groups, bringing flowers and bringing tears, for Grandmother was gone. She had loved much and lived beautifully and her home had been a centre of attraction, while her example had been full of cheer and inspiration.

How do you treat your grandmother? Ask yourself how you would like to be treated when instead of being seventeen, twenty-seven, thirty-five, forty or anywhere else along the road, you are in the shadow of fourscore. I beg of you not to fetter your grandmother by emphasizing the fact that her youth has fled. Let her do as she pleases. Do not call attention to her infirmities. If occasionally she is fretful remind yourself that your own temper is not invariably proof against vexations. Be fair and loving and just in the way you treat your grandmother.

At the Other End of the Wire

YOU take down the receiver and address through the transmitter an invisible personage at the other end of the wire. This invisible personage sits for hours receiving orders from those she does not see and helps them to send messages and hold conversations on matters of greater or less moment. We call her "Central." At home in her family she is Mary, Jane, Susie, somebody dear to father and mother and, in short, a human being. Why speak to her rudely and curtly when the wire is out of order or the party of the second part is deaf, has a poor telephone voice, or is otherwise unable to converse clearly and intelligibly?

Speaking of telephone manners, those who have a party wire sometimes forget that they should not monopolize the line, particularly in the hurried morning hours when everybody wants to hold communication with tradesmen, and when there are trains about to start, and reasons without number why people should be considerate. Women thoughtlessly transgress in this direction, and sometimes carry on lengthy discussions when a little thought would induce them to be brief.

Still another matter is involved in telephone manners. There is a time limit for which one pays when talking with a friend at a distance. One is allowed five minutes, and if one continues to talk for fifteen somebody must pay for three calls.

Who shall conclude a telephone conversation? Who shall first ring off? The obvious reply to this frequently asked question is that the person who begins a conversation is the person to close it.

Woman's Responsibility

TWO atrocious and brutal lynchings, for one of which there was neither palliation nor excuse, have recently taken place in this country. One occurred in Pennsylvania, and the other in Nebraska. The Pennsylvania outrage has been widely commented upon by the religious and secular press, but little has been said or thought about woman's responsibility for crimes of sudden violence. The gentle nurses in the Coatesville hospital who were swept aside like leaves before a storm when they tried to protect a wounded and manacled negro from the fury of a mob, did their best. In every age a hospital has been a sanctuary, and no matter what might have been done by highway robber or murderer, he was not dragged out to death by legal process or otherwise, from a bed of pain. The actors in lynching and other insensate tragedies are generally men, and usually men in their hot-headed youth. How have these boys been trained? What influence has been brought to bear upon them by mothers? Are the women of the period doing their duty to the men of the next generation? Do we not need more iron in the blood? Can women escape responsibility for the moral degradation that stalks abroad today? Mothers have the making of men in their hands. The women of a town disgraced by shameless crime should put on mourning and let their men-folk see their sorrow and contempt. Twenty centuries of Christianity should make impossible such deeds as we have witnessed of late.

An Enterprising Woman

IN Newark, New Jersey, a woman recently paved the sidewalk in front of her home, doing the work with her own two hands. She was indisposed to pay the amount demanded by the contractor and decided that she could lay a sidewalk to her satisfaction and save expense. Having studied up the subject, made investigations as to the cost of materials, and incidentally watched the work wherever she saw it progressing, she carried out her purpose and succeeded in making a creditable job.

A woman who could lay a sidewalk successfully could build a house, dig a garden, reap a harvest or do anything else for which she had a mind. Whether it requires more strength to do such work as this than to play tennis or golf, row a boat or drive a four-in-hand, who can say? The manifest result in this case happens to be a durable sidewalk, made by a vigorous woman.

Athletics for Girls

A NEW departure in athletics has been inaugurated by the gallantry of the boy students of the Montclair High School, who have recently admitted the girls into their base-ball organization. Whether or not girls are to officiate as catchers and pitchers, to make home runs, shine as out-fielders or be efficient on third base we are not informed. Probably they will continue in the role of enthusiastic spectators, cheering the boys as they play their favorite game. When girls play base-ball on their own account they apparently succeed as well as in basket-ball, and the one game is very nearly as dangerous as the other and is certainly as rough on occasion.

Montclair, a beautiful town in northern New Jersey, has the distinction of enrolling among its citizens a very large number of college graduates of both sexes. The late Rev. Amory H. Bradford used to call it a university town without a university.

The Heaviest Cross

A MOTHER writing to this page exclaims, "Oh, tell all mothers who bury their darlings in their unstained infancy that theirs is not the heaviest grief. A far heavier cross is hers who sees her hopes blasted when the child she has loved and almost idolized wanders away, does wrong and disgraces his manhood. Is there any comfort," she cries, "for one who is bearing this excruciating pain?"

To the mother we would say, "Yes, there is comfort. Read the sweet story of the prodigal son who in the far country, when feeding on husks, envied the servants in his father's house and knew that he was no more worthy to be called a son. He repented, went back to his father, was forgiven and began a new life. Grief's heaviest cross may be lightened by forgiving love and the prodigal's return.

IN A MYSTERIOUS WAY

By C. H. KILMER

VENING twilight shrouded the thriving and beautiful village of Monroeton, where, in the of Merton Smiley, the village er, Mr. and Mrs. Smiley had just n their chairs back from the din- able, and he was sitting with his d napkin in one hand and the in the other, with eyelids closed, ingly arrested for the moment in study.

penny for your thoughts, on," said Mrs. Smiley.

erhaps they are worth more than Esther, for this one time any- " said the husband, looking up, completing the act of placing the in in the ring. "You don't care now all my office affairs, but I'll you something of this case, which came to my mind. I took it in the of business as business, without zing at the time what it included, the thing troubles me, though I n't gone so far yet but that I can out of it.

A little quiet home just flashed in mind like a moving picture. A little cottage and barn with a acres of land, all the surroundings and clean. It is occupied by Mr. Mrs. Manley. He does something market gardening and small fruits. may have seen him?"

Yes, I think I know who he is. I bought berries and other fruit of . He seems always pleasant and teous."

You're right. Good education and ed tastes, and a thorough church- , too, descending from the Scotch enanters, as I did, by the way, igh I have sadly degenerated, ing my wife to keep up the re- ous side of the house."

Well, dear," said Mrs. Smiley ing her husband's brief silence, "I at a loss to know, so far, where Manley comes into the case you ted out on, or what should trouble unless it is religious backsliding n your parentage."

Be that as it may, wife," said he h some show of guilt at her con- ling sentence, I haven't digressed far from that case as you may k. There's another man now s on the field, and his name is eon Dickens, who has a claim on t little home. Manley once owned ice farm, about two miles out, and r of debt. He had two sons who parently were not strong enough farm work, and who went to New k, where they became clerks in a olesale drug house. In course of e they got the idea of opening a g store here in the village. That s bfore we came. The idea was d; no such trade had been carried here, the business is profitable, l Manley thought he was safe ough in mortgaging his farm and rting them. For some reason— h notions of the young men's city es, servants, dining parties, clubs, y credit with their customers, and y credit with the New York house ere they were formerly employed, o had the greatest confidence in m—or, all combined; anyway, the siness failed. Dickens held the rtgage, the farm went, but enough s saved to buy the little home where nley now lives.

"Soon after, the sons died, within a rt time of each other, and their es went back to New York and rried again. One left a child, who now living with the grandparents. me time after the death of the sons, s. Manley was taken to a hospital New York. Dickens loaned him the ney and took a mortgage on the ce where they live. Doctors' bills d other things have kept Dickens t of the interest for two years and will foreclose. I sent for Mr. nley, who came in the office this ternoon, and I learned much that I was ignorant of before. That's the case, and of course it's legal business, and lawfully just; but it is not pleasant to think of being instrumental in pushing that family out of their home."

"It wouldn't hurt Dickens to make Mr. Manley a present of the little he owes him," said Mrs. Smiley, preparing to clear the dishes from the table.

"Such things happen, but they're rare. The more such men get, the more they want," said he, rising from the table. "Now, I don't know what I'm going for, but I feel as though I should go down to Mr. Manley's, though I confess I don't see any way out for him; but there is a way for me out." He took his hat from the peg, saying, "I'll not be gone long," opened the door and went out.

When Mr. Manley arrived home that evening from the interview with the lawyer, it was some time before he could muster courage to go into the house. He had told his wife that the lawyer had requested him to call at the office. A train of thoughts ran through his mind as he went to attend to some matters at the barn. It was worse now than the loss of the farm. He had hoped by the aid of his soldier pension and the prospect of the recovery of Mrs. Manley to make good. If turned out he could go to the Soldiers' Home, but that wasn't a pleasant thing to think of; to go out from a home of comfort to take a little cot bed and bureau washstand in a room with a hundred others; and if he should have to endure this, his wife couldn't go. Under this depression he almost unconsciously went into the house, and into the room where Mrs. Manley was lying with head bolstered on pillows, and sat down at the bedside. She looked up cheerfully and said, "I know, Thomas, what it is—why the lawyer wanted you to call. What did Mr. Smiley say?"

"Dickens is urging him to foreclose. I'm not destroyed, but I'm cast down. If it was only myself I could stand it well enough; but you and Elsie?" A tear started down his handsome, manly face and he could go no further.

"We can't change the fact that it does seem hard, Thomas, but 'I have been young and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread.' Husband, let us have faith!"

Just then Elsie appeared in the doorway of the room, having just come from school, and went forward to greet her grandmother with the usual kiss. Mr. Manley turned to go out, and as he was passing through the doorway, Mrs. Manley said with a strong, hopeful voice, "Jehovah jireh, Thomas!" to which he responded as he cast back an affectionate glance, "Amen!"

The next day after these incidents, Simeon Dickens called early on his attorney. After the formalities of the day, Mr. Smiley went to his desk, and taking out a folded paper handed it to Mr. Dickens, saying, "I will not press your claim against that man. You can get some one else to take it or withdraw it as you like."

"Is there no money in it?"

"Yes, a little; but it would come from the sale of that man's home. I want nothing to do with it."

"Frightened, eh?"

"Not at all."

"I suppose the fellow begged hard to be let off?"

"In a way, yes."

"And you caved in?"

"You may call it so."

"What did you do?"

"I think I shed a few tears."

"And a lawyer? Well, I'm beat. Manley begged you hard, you say?"

—and fifteen thousand voices answer, "Aye, Aye!"

THIS enthusiastic verdict has been rendered by 15,000 physicians who thereby have decided the question: Is Sanatogen a true food-tonic of genuine merit and real efficiency?

Truly a unique vote of confidence, demonstrating to the world the belief of a great profession in a great preparation. When fifteen thousand men of science, among them the master minds of medicine, give their written endorsement of

Sanatogen
THE FOOD-TONIC

there must be conviction born of actual experience and observation. The physician watches in his patients the splendid reconstructive effect of Sanatogen, sees how wonderfully it feeds and strengthens enfeebled nerves, how it helps digestion, efficiently and persistently bringing into play the vital forces that make for perfect health.

Only after repeated experience and observation does the physician feel justified in expressing his opinion. It is under such conditions that 15,000 physicians have endorsed Sanatogen.

Thus results, demonstrated worth, are the factors behind this unexampled endorsement—because Sanatogen is prepared on scientific principles, in harmony with the known functions of the body machine. Its concentrated elements are so combined as to fulfill the true functions of a tissue food with the wonderful tonic power of a creative, reconstructive force.

When Sanatogen demonstrates these qualities, is it surprising that recognition should come from the world's master physicians, and should not this recognition mean a very great deal to you?

His Excellency Prof. Dr. Von Leyden
Director First Medical Clinic, Berlin University, writes:
"I have gladly and frequently prescribed Sanatogen in cases of delicate patients in my clinical as well as my private practice and am extremely satisfied with the results."

Prof. C. A. Ewald
of Berlin University, Doctor honoris causa Johns Hopkins Medical School, Baltimore, writes:
"I can say that I have used Sanatogen in a great number of cases (that is, in those disturbances of metabolism which were mainly of a nervous or neurasthenic origin), and have obtained excellent results."

Prof. Thos. B. Stillman, M.S., Ph.D.
The well-known research chemist of Steven's Institute, writes:
"The chemical union of the constituents of Sanatogen is a true one, representative of the highest skill in the formation of a product containing phosphorus in the organic phosphate condition and so combined that digestion and assimilation of Sanatogen are rendered complete with the greatest ease."

"Our Nerves of Tomorrow"—FREE

This is a beautifully illustrated treatise by a physician of note, absorbingly interesting and brimful of facts and information that are of vital interest to you. The book also contains evidence of the value of Sanatogen, which is as remarkable as it is conclusive.

Sanatogen is sold in three sizes: $1.00—$1.90—$3.60

West Point Bars Dullards

AT a recent entrance examination of candidates who had been nominated by Senators and Representatives from different States for cadetships in West Point Military Academy, some of the papers written by the young men revealed a strange lack of educational qualifications. Major-General Thomas H. Barry, superintendent of the Academy, gives the story of these examinations in his annual report and incidentally takes occasion to express regret that sufficient care is not exercised in the choice of candidates for cadetships. He adds that the methods of instruction in some of the schools are evidently far from being thorough and satisfactory.

Certain questions on the list were designed to show a "fair knowledge of the names of the most prominent English and American authors and their principal works." Some of the answers he gives verbatim as follows:

Robert Burns was and English he was born in England and his parents were very poor. He is considered one of the greatest English His poems sound different from that of the other poets. The sound much more smoother. . . . His opportunities were not good but he was determine. The poetical blood seemed to have run through his veins. He knew the peasant life well and it influenced his works of later years. No poet has evern been able too surpass him in describing the peasant life.

Another question, concerning Napoleon and his defeat at Waterloo, elicited these extraordinary answers:

(1) The battle of Waterloo where Napoleon the most noted and powerful ruler also general that Europe has ever produced, is what some authorities say as to his greatness, met his defeat his defeat was merely an oversight on his part.

(2) The Battle of Waterloo was fought between the French and English. The French were led by Nepoliean and the English by Lord Wellingford.

(3) Nepoliean had captured most of Europe and had been carrying on a war against England. The English were the better on seas but French beat them on land.

What some of the candidates knew of English literary history was set down in a surprising series of answers, chiefly distinguished by misstatements, misspellings and bad grammar. Here are a few examples:

The important writers of the 19th were nearly all raised as poor boys fr families. The one we should class firs them is Longfellow. After his deat people of England thought so much ab they ask for his bust for the Poets C West Minister Abbey. It stands in a p place to-day.

Historical questions brough some amazing answers, among were these:

General Barry comments shar the result of the examination and "There are surely thousands of men, well grounded in the ess branches, who would welcom chance to enter the military serv cadets, and it seems reasonable t that the fitness of appointees be oughly tested before they are mitted to take entrance examinat Of 553 candidates at the first nation, 165 failed mentally, 42 physically and mentally, and passed. At the second examin 78 out of 242 passed. Of anothe tingent of 83, only 15 were found fied for admission.

"No, I didn't say so. He didn't speak a word to me."

"Who did he address, then, in your hearing?"

"God Almighty."

"Ah! he prayed, did he?"

"Not for my benefit, at least. The matter so weighed on me, I went down to their home last night. I knocked at the half open door. There was no answer, and I stepped into the hall. The sitting-room door was a little way open, and I was about to knock again, when a woman's voice said, "Come, father, begin; I'm ready." As he bowed on his knees at the bedside he came to my view. First, he said to God that they were his submissive children, and no matter what he saw fit to bring on them they would bow at his will. Of course, it was going to be hard for them to be homeless at their age, especially with mother sick and helpless. Then his voice broke and a thin white hand stole from the cover and moved softly over his silvered hair. Then he went on to say that it might have been different if one son could have been spared, and that nothing could be so sharp as the parting with the two sons, unless mother and he should be separated. Finally, he fell to comforting himself with the fact that the dear Lord knew that it was through no fault of theirs that mother and he were threatened with the loss of their home, which meant beggary and the almshouse, a place they prayed to be delivered from if consistent with God's will. And oh! where would Elsie go? Then he quoted many promises concerning those who put their trust in the I would rather go to the poorhous self to-night than stain my hear hands with such a prosecutio that."

Peace Circles Teach Patriotism

For the best account of a Peace Circle meeting, not to exceed 200 words, mailed to us not later than November 20, and accompanied by a photograph of the Circle in session, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offers a prize of $10; for the second best $5; the third best $3, and for the three next in order of merit prizes of $2 each. Address all communications to SECRETARY CHRISTIAN HERALD Peace League, Bible House, New York.

THE extraordinary growth of the Peace Circle movement is attested by the fact that in the last two weeks we have received the largest list of names of organizers that has yet come to hand. These are from Connecticut, Indiana, Illinois, Idaho, Iowa, Kansas, Massachusetts, Maine, Montana, Missouri, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Virginia, West Virginia, Minnesota, and North Dakota. To a large extent these Circles are being started in new territory, where the movement has only now found a footing.

Again we extend a cordial invitation to all who desire to co-operate with us in this inspiring work. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is prepared to supply, free of cost, to all Peace Circles working with us (no matter how small the Circle may be) appropriate Peace Leaflets containing full instructions for organization, adoption of constitution and by-laws, duties of the various offices for the conduct of regular semi-monthly meetings and special suggestions for receptions, concerts, stereopticon entertainments, appropriate historic tableaux, monologues, recitations, musical gatherings, etc., etc., besides suggestions for special "Red Letter Day" programmes.

The Peace Message is one that, by its very nature, should react intimately in our hearts and homes and read itself into our everyday affairs. "Peace on earth" may still be far off, but it is ours to pray for it and to work for it, and thus to advance the coming of the Kingdom of Peace. Men, swayed by motives of selfishness and ambition, deal with one another unkindly and unfairly. Out from our homes, the highest types of manhood and womanhood must come. Our sons and daughters must carry forward the noble ideal:

Beautiful, free and strong,
The light we almost had Shall make them glad.

. . . Hope's daily oracles
From their lips shall be brought,
And in our lives love's hourly miracles
By them be wrought.
Their merry task shall be
To make the house all fine and sweet,
Its new inhabitants to greet
The wondrous dawning century.

Reading of Matter from Headquarters and General Discussion of Topic:
Is a Nation Ever Justified in Breaking the World's Peace? This is peculiarly timely in view of the present war between Italy and Turkey. Both powers were signatories to the Hague agreement. One was willing to arbitrate the matter; the other was not. Treaties were lightly broken, pledges violated. It was not a question that called for a war of reprisal or punishment. Is a nation, any more than an individual, ever justified in taking the law into its own hands? See the attitude of the world's leading journals:

New York Times: "A shock to the moral sentiments of England and Germany."

London Standard: "The same conception of ethics and international rights as the Barbary corsairs."

German press: "Brutal violence and political hypocrisy"; "An act of brigandage."

French press: "It gives us moral shiverings."

Italy, a great nation with a famous history; Turkey, a nation with a record for cruelty and fanaticism. Yet to which of the two is due the spectacle of clashing forces, sinking ships, bombarded cities and the other horrors of war we see to-day? How could all this have been avoided and justice done to both sides without strife? Does violence ever decide any great principle?

Chicago's Sunday Evening Club

ESTABLISHED and maintained under the active supervision of Chicago business men, in an endeavor to provide a virile, appealing service of Christian fellowship and inspiration for strangers and for hotel, club and boarding-house residents, the Chicago Sunday Evening Club is achieving a marked degree of success. This new form of Christian-social institution has aroused much interest. Services are held every Sunday evening from October to June, in Orchestra Hall, a large auditorium in the heart of Chicago's business district, and seating 3,000. The feature at each meeting is an address by an invited speaker of national or international reputation. These men and women give inspiring talks based upon the life and teachings of Jesus Christ, and dealing directly with individual and civic betterment. The call of each is to higher ideals and to better citizenship.

Governors, senators, judges, educators, authors, presidents of great corporations, in addition to distinguished clergymen of all denominations were among the speakers of the occasion. On October 29 President Taft made the address. During the coming weeks the speakers will include ex-Governor Joseph Folk, Bishop William A. Quayle, Jacob Riis, Wilfred T. Grenfell and William Jennings Bryan.

Non-sectarian and strictly Christian, the Club endeavors to co-operate with all the churches of Chicago through a committee on church affiliation. The club was organized and is conducted entirely by business men, some of whom take part in every service. They have brought in scores of earnest, able, successful young men. The officers and trustees include Secretary of the Treasury Franklin MacVeagh, John G. Shedd, president of Marshall Field & Co.; Clifford W. Barnes, A. C. Bartlett of Hibbard, Spencer, Bartlett & Co., John V. Farwell, D. R. Forgan, Marvin Hughitt, Richard C. Hall and others. There are no paid officers, and all money contributed is expended for rent of hall, expenses of speakers, music and printing.

representation. It could have no place in our service except by virtue of its efficiency. I am thinking only of what it does for us to be able to approach things on a side that reveals to us their deepest and their eternal significance. You know perfectly well that the objects that ordinarily engage our attention may be handled by us, and ordinarily are handled by us, in a way that recognizes only their smaller and their transient meanings; that they spell out to us no great thought, and therefore do not touch us at that point in our souls where we are greatest.

Take as an illustration the common occurrences in the world of nature; the sighing of the wind, the opening of a blossom, the flight of a bird, the sweep of the tide, the swing of a star; that is all very commonplace as we ordinarily think of it; it may interest us a little as a plaything amuses a child, but in our common mood of mind it spells out nothing to us; no great thinking is generated by it; no deep feeling is aroused by it; there is discerned in it nothing large that touches us at the point where we are large. The water that drops to the ground in the form of rain is usually quite prosaic; but once in a while the sun touches the falling drops at such an angle as to kindle them into color and knit them together into a band of rainbow splendor. Now it is having the common facts of the physical world touched by a superior light in something the way the summer rain is gilded by the sunshine that is the sort of transfiguration that I am just now thinking of. Even the heathen nations, more than we, let the phenomena of nature spell out all kinds of rich meaning to them. To them this great coarse world was almost a personal thing. By them it was peopled by beautiful administrative spirits. To the Psalmist all these wonderful facts and processes in the universe of earth, seas and stars were the incarnation of a Divine presence. To him it was always true that "the ground whereon thou standest is holy ground," and everything seen under transfigurement, witnessed by the light that fell upon it from a higher sky. Nature is one thing when it is construed as a mechanical workshop, another thing when it is construed as God's sanctuary.

Or consider again the two aspects under which we can contemplate moral duty; the untransfigured and the transfigured. Duty as we have rather been taught to view it is an awkward burden that has to be carried; a disagreeable chore needing to be done; a certain compulsion that it does not quite answer to resist; all of which makes the very word "duty" to be a hard word, hard and offensive; almost as unfeeling in its relation to us as gravity is in its relation to rocks and planets. But when we put the matter under something the same kind of light that brightened the Holy Mount, the road to Damascus and the Bush at Horeb, the entire thing is at once translated into a different world. Duty is then taken off from the ground and laid in the air, reaches all the way up to God's throne, and is felt by us to be, not a requirement legislated by society, not a statute enacted by our conscience, but as being nothing other than the great Spirit making his holiness felt in the hidden sanctuary of the human heart. Scripture invariably contemplates duty under exactly that kind of transfigurement.

Man, also, has two meanings according as we look at him in the under light or read him in the upper light. The under light discloses him to us as a human thing; the upper light reveals him to us as a child of God. The employer who uses his employee as an improved machine, and with a view simply to what he can get out of him, contemplates him as a human thing; the missionary who goes down town, or off into China, to present the Gospel views him as a child of God. The difference between the salvation of the race and the damnation of the race is simply a matter of whether men are contemplated from the ground up or from heaven down, inspected as specimens or beheld as Jesus was, standing just under the cover of the sky.

One more example would be to say that there are those same two points of view from which to estimate the meaning of events and the processes of history. Napoleon is reported to have said that God was on the side of the heavy battalions. David just as distinctly said that he was not. Napoleon had the battalions, but he died in the island of St. Helena. We may not forget the function of iron and dynamite, but that is the least part of it, although the only part of it that becomes visible by the aid of the under light. You may have seen Kaulbach's picture, "The Battle of the Huns," founded on the tradition of the combat before the gates of Rome, between the Romans and the spirits of the Huns who were slain, which rising into the air continued to fight—a representation fraught with long and momentous suggestion, enticing the thought away from the ponderable energies enlisted in the world's conflicts and letting the final issues be determined by immaterial forces in an immaterial world.

And then there is that other picture Scripturally drawn for us in the Second Book of Kings. The King of Syria was in pursuit of Elisha, and with a great host overtook him at Dothan. Elisha and his servant were alone and the occasion offered open field for determining the validity of the Napoleonic doctrine. The servant became panic-stricken. Elisha said to him, "Fear not, for they that be with us are more than they that be with them." And Elisha prayed and said, "Lord, I pray thee, open his eyes that he may see." And the Lord opened the eyes of the young man and he saw; and behold, the mountain was full of horses and chariots of fire around about Elisha.

Commerce with only so much of the world as is revealed to us by its nether lights shortens our vision, deadens our appreciation, paralyzes our power. Our connections, by the very nature of circumstances, must be very considerably with small things. But the small things must be so arranged and illuminated as to spell out to us large meanings. Little things are not given to us as finalities but as lenses with which to bring into view the regions beyond, "while we look not at the things that are seen but at the things that are not seen; for the things that are seen are temporal, but the things that are not seen are eternal."

THE SWEET REFRAIN

I HEAR it singing in the dawn—
A world-old, sweet refrain—
I hear its notes insistent drawn
In music of the rain;
It sings within the swaying corn,
A canticle of cheer
That glorifies the golden morn:
"He loves thee: do not fear."

I hear it singing in the noon
When aging summer grieves,
And fading maples sadly croon
The farewell of the leaves;
I hear it when 'mid shrouding snows
The chanting winds intone
A threnody above the rose:
"Will he he not keep his own?"

I hear it singing in the night
When out across the bar
The moonlight falls in shimmering white,
And calls my bark afar;
It sings to me when vesper bells
Steal out from the deep,
And through all nature sings and swells:
"He loves thee: rest and sleep."

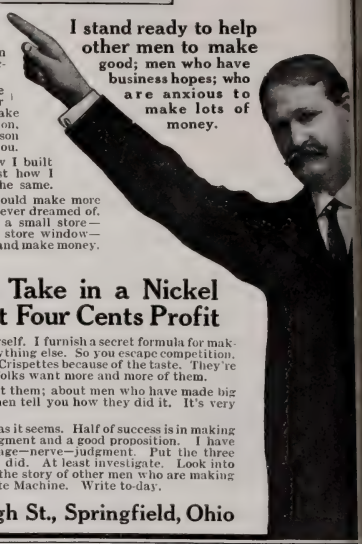
Popcorn Crispettes Built This Big Busines For Me

This is a picture of my big confectionery store in Springfield, Ohio.



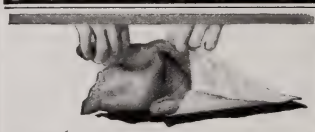
The money I earned selling Popcorn Crispettes—a new, delicious confection—enabled me to establish it.

My Popcorn Crispette Machine made me a rich man. Any other man who goes at it as I did can make a lot of money. I am just a common, everyday sort of a fellow. No reason why I should do any better than you.

Write me today. I'll tell you how I built my big business. I'll tell you just how I went about it—how you can do the same.

If you follow instructions you should make more money this fall and winter than you ever dreamed of. Somewhere in your town there is a small store—a half-store, a little nook or even a store window—where you can set up your machine and make money. You can start at home if you wish.

I stand ready to help other men to make good; men who have business hopes; who are anxious to make lots of money.



Every Time You Take in a Nickel You Make Almost Four Cents Profit

You'll have a good thing all to yourself. I furnish a secret formula for making Crispettes; it's different from anything else. So you escape competition. People buy and buy and buy Popcorn Crispettes because of the taste. They're so different—so tasty and tempting, folks want more and more of them.

In my literature I tell you all about them; about men who have made big money with the machine, and the men tell you how they did it. It's very interesting reading.

Making money isn't nearly as hard as it seems. Half of success is in making the start—the other half is nerve, judgment and a good proposition. I have the proposition—you have the courage—nerve—judgment. Put the three together now and make money, as I did. At least investigate. Look into the proposition. Get my story, and the story of other men who are making money with a Long Popcorn Crispette Machine. Write to-day.

Corns All Gone By Wednesday

Apply a Blue-jay plaster on Monday, and the pain stops instantly. By Wednesday the whole corn loosens and comes out. No pain, no soreness, no inconvenience. All because of a soft wax which separates the callous from the toe.

Why do you temporize with corns? Why merely pare them or protect them? Here is a way to remove the corn, harmlessly, painlessly, and in 48 hours. Millions of people use it. It has fifty times as large a sale as any other treatment for corns. Think what folly it is to suffer a corn when a simple Blue-jay plaster ends the whole trouble. Go get it now.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

World's Temperance Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

THIS lesson is placed here a little out of its historical order, as a fitting story for World's Temperance Sunday. It belongs to the years before the "remnant" of the Jews returned from captivity, between the lessons on Daniel's courage: refusing the king's wine as a boy at Babylon, and refusing to hide his religion to save his political office (Dan. 1 and 6). There are other sins besides those of king whose deadly folly this story illustrates; vice, profanity and pride. The Belshazzar of our lesson is the grandson of Nebuchadnezzar. Like many other young men, Belshazzar had no warning from the "stern lessons of ancestral experience." The father of Belshazzar, Nabonidus, had succeeded Nebuchadnezzar as King of Babylon, and had made his son, though only seventeen years of age, a king of associate king, probably as regent of Babylon, where he was living in when his father was defeated in battle by Cyrus the Mede, whose army thereupon marched on the capital and killed Nabonidus outside the walls. Perhaps Belshazzar was prompted to give this feast upon hearing of his father's death, not only to impress his confidence in his walls and gods, and his foolish defiance of his foes, but also to celebrate the fact that he was now a king indeed, though in name for so brief a time, as is proved by the fact that the cuneiform inscriptions upon the Assyrian tablets name Nabonidus as the last king of Babylon and Belshazzar's name appears only in an inscribed prayer of the father to his gods that his son may be saved: "Let not sin possess him." Oh, the tragedy of it! The contrast between the two pictures of many a life: what his parents prayed he should be, what he was!

Behind walls a hundred feet thick—so wide that they were roadways for four chariots of Babylon; in a marble palace a mile long—perhaps the palace recently uncovered in Babylon on which the names of Nebuchadnezzar and Cyrus are inscribed—Belshazzar gathered at a banquet of wine the thousand men of his great household and the princes of the empire. To show his confidence not only of Cyrus but of all his people save his own, he ordered brought in the sacred vessels that Nebuchadnezzar had stolen from God's temple at Jerusalem. Filled with the courage that wine gives, that courage which is but blind recklessness, he defied the gods and Persians at his gates, and the God of Israel, whose sacred vessels he profaned.

But what is that shadowy hand moving on the wall and writing in letters of fire?

A hand was a Babylonian charm, the first fingers, like a rosary, recalling the names of God. Even now one sometimes sees in the Orient above a doorway a hand, whose purpose is to avert the evil eye and invite good luck. Such a hand was probably already inscribed on the palace wall, above its entrance, and Belshazzar was relying on it for protection against any foe, human or divine, entering his banquet hall. In Bible miracles God uses human elements so far as possible, and adds the supernatural only so far as it is necessary. He might even in this case use a guilty conscience. It is profitless to debate this. Suffice it that the very thing in which Belshazzar trusted, the hand on the wall, became a terror. His magicians having failed to say what the words meant, Daniel was called, at the suggestion of the queen dowager, who remembered how he had read a judgment of God to Nebuchadnezzar. Daniel interpreted the words as a sentence of death to Belshazzar individually, and to Babylon of defeat and subjection. And "that same night," King Cyrus, turning aside the river that flowed under Babylon's walls, marched his army into the city through the river bed, and slew Belshazzar in the midst of his impious orgies, and sacked the city. "Babylon is fallen." It had gone down the three well-worn steps to the graveyard of nations: first, moral, then physical, then political decay. From many trades drinking men are excluded. When shall we learn that as clear a brain is needed to run a government as to run a freight train?

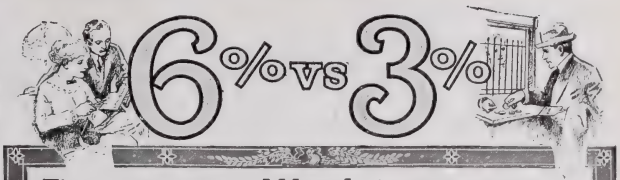
The old argument for abstinence was that one who drinks may become a drunkard; the new argument is that only by abstinence can one reach the highest efficiency. As John G. Woolley says, the argument is no longer failure but fitness. The United States Bureau of Labor sums up a report on "The Economic Aspects of the Liquor Question," based partly on answers to questions sent to a representative list of American employers, in these words: "More than half the establishments reporting require, in certain occupations and under certain circumstances, that employees shall not use intoxicating liquors." Business men and even labor unions have been fooled into the belief that "prohibition hurt business," when in fact to transfer the capital that employed a hundred men in making boots and shoes to making liquors would put eleven-twelfths of the men out of a job.

In this connection we quote as of profound significance a statement by the Crown Prince of Sweden at the opening of the Good Templar Summer Festival, Hesselholm, 1910:

"The temperance movement is one of the greatest of our time, a movement by which the people will gain self-reliance and self-control. The final aim is nothing less than the most complete possible liberation of our people from the destructive effects of the use of alcohol. There are, of course, differences of opinion as to the best way of attaining this end. But that the end can and must be reached is the principal point upon which all are united. . . . In our time the struggle for existence goes on among the peoples with increasing sharpness, because general development is progressing with remarkable and increasing swiftness. It is of great importance to the state, as well as to the individual, to use the utmost exertion not to be left helpless in the rear and perhaps to be finally overcome by a more vigorous people. This will so obviously strengthen the competitive power of a people in the world's markets that I do not hesitate to make this assertion: THAT NATION WHICH IS THE FIRST TO FREE ITSELF FROM THE INJURIOUS EFFECTS OF ALCOHOL WILL THEREBY ATTAIN A MARKED ADVANTAGE OVER OTHER NATIONS IN THE AMICABLE YET INTENSIVE STRUGGLE FOR EXISTENCE. I hope that our country will be the one which will first understand and secure this advantage."

Not only in Sweden and Germany but in France also the patriotic argument is foremost. The French Government posts warnings even against tippling that falls short of drunkenness "for the future of the nation."

SLEEP SWEET!



SLEEP sweet within this quiet room,
O thou! whoe'er thou art;
And let no mournful yesterday
Disturb thy peaceful heart.

Nor let to-morrow scare thy rest
With dreams of coming ill.
Thy Maker is thy changeless Friend,
His love surrounds thee still.

Forget thyself and all the world,
Put out each feverish light.
The stars are watching overhead.
Sleep sweet. Good night! Good night!

First mortgage gold bonds Safe as a savings bank

THE rule of three is the surest way to test the desirability of an investment. First: Is it absolutely safe? Second: Is the revenue attractive? Third: Can it be cashed quickly?

We offer first mortgage gold bonds, on improved, income-producing, selected Chicago real estate, which have passed the test of this rule, with a margin of security in no case less than twice the value of the bonds. During our 29-year career no investor has ever lost a dollar of principal or interest on securities purchased of us.

Your savings bank only pays you 3% or 4%—the securities we offer earn 5½% to 6%, with equal safety and convertibility.

The bonds are quickly convertible—our repurchase proposition is good at any time. In denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. (55)

Your Church Fair

We Will Help You Make It A Success

WE HAVE outlined a new plan which we know will help to make every Church Fair a success by increasing its attendance and receipts. We have prepared a special booklet, giving a number of plans and suggestions for new features of entertainment at Church Fairs. We will send one of these booklets, entirely free, to the chairman of the committee in charge of the Church Fair. Most of the plans and features in it have nothing whatever to do with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In fact, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Booth is only one of the features of the Fair. We supply free of charge a large number of pictures for decoration of the booth, which are afterwards to be given away to CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers. These pictures comprise from 25 to 30 of the greatest paintings of the world reproduced in full color and range in size from small 6 x 9 to large 14 x 20.

Free Copies of The Christian Herald

We will supply a considerable quantity, regulated by the size of the Church, of free copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. These are to be sold and the entire proceeds donated to the Church Fair. In addition to this, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Booth may take subscriptions for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for which a very liberal and special commission will be paid.

MONEY FOR THE CHURCH

Our booklet and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Booth will enable you to largely increase the receipts of your Church Fair, and make it a wonderful success. Of all ways of earning money for any special purposes, the Church Fair is by far the easiest and most popular. To make it a success, however, there must be some new and unique features which come as a pleasant surprise to those attending, and which help to produce a spirit of liberality; and at the same time leave everyone with a feeling of having received more than their money's worth.

Subscribers will confer a favor if they will please call this matter to the attention of the proper persons in their Church.

THE TEA PENALTY

A Strong Man's Experience

Writing from a busy railroad town the wife of an employe of one of the great roads says:

"My husband is a railroad man who has been so much benefited by the use of Postum that he wishes me to express his thanks to you for the good it has done him. His waking hours are taken up with his work, and he has no time to write himself.

"He has been a great tea drinker all his life and has always liked it strong.

"Tea has, of late years, acted on him like morphine does upon most people. At first it soothed him, but only for an hour or so, then it began to affect his nerves to such an extent that he could not sleep at night, and he would go to his work in the morning wretched and miserable from the loss of rest. This condition grew constantly worse, until his friends persuaded him, some four months ago, to quit tea and use Postum.

"At first he used Postum only for breakfast, but as he liked the taste of it, and it somehow seemed to do him good, he added it to his evening meal. Then, as he grew better, he began to drink it for his noon meal, and now he will drink nothing else at table.

"His condition is so wonderfully improved that he could not be hired to give up Postum and go back to tea. His nerves have become steady and reliable once more, and his sleep is easy, natural and refreshing.

"He owes all this to Postum for he has taken no medicine and made no other change in his diet.

"His brother who was very nervous from coffee-drinking, was persuaded by us to give up the coffee and use Postum and he also, has recovered his health and strength." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

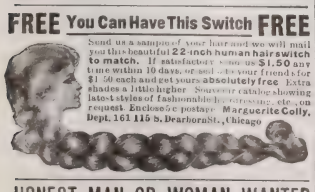
The Ideal Home Country

lies in the wide territory traversed by the Southern Ry. System. From the high lands of the Appalachians, with their dry, healthy climate, to the Piedmont section, with its heavy, yielding lands, on to the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, where every crop thrives—somewhere in this broad territory you can find a place just suited to your needs and means.

Land prices range from $15 to $50 per acre. The first year's crop often more than returns the purchase price.



All grasses, grains, fruits and vegetables known to the temperate zone thrive in the Southeast. Alfalfa grows nearly everywhere—4 to 6 tons per acre not uncommon—$15 to $22 per ton paid locally. Apple orchards net $100 to $500 an acre. Truck gardening yields $200 to $400 per acre—everything else in proportion.

The Southeast is the farmer's paradise.

We have booklets giving full information of conditions in each Southeastern State. Address

At What Age Should Women Marry?

GREAT interest has been aroused in the recent statistics collected by the alumnae of Smith College, regarding the stability of marriage among them. Their figures prove that among college-bred women throughout our land there is but one divorce to every fifty-seven marriages; while among Smith graduates there is but one divorce to every eighty-five marriages.

The extraordinary nature of these statements can be realized only by comparing them with the statistics of divorce throughout the nation at large, where we are told that the appalling ratio obtains of one divorce to every twelve marriages.

The old theory that early marriages are necessarily the happiest, falls to pieces before these figures; for college women rarely marry before the age of twenty-three, while some of the happiest of all their marriages take place when both parties to the bond have passed the age of thirty!

We used to think that the greater ease of the very young in adjusting themselves to a new and unselfish life, more than compensated for their lack of maturity. In fact, as a witty man used to say, "the matrimonial leap usually has to be taken under the inspiration of youthful courage," for when we are older and wiser, we are likely not to dare its perilous uncertainties. There is still this consideration to reckon with, and it should be given due weight. Youth is the period of adaptation. Youth is the time of uncalculating bravery. But as the age at which the great mass of our girls marry averages from seventeen to twenty, and as the ratio of divorce among them is one to every twelve marriages, it is plain to see that the compensations in other respects must overbalance in the college woman, the favorable quality of youth.

Of course, age does not always bring discretion. As Elihu remarked to Job, the aged do not always "understand judgment." A girl who is silly at seventeen may still be silly at twenty-five; but generally she grows wiser with the years. The college girl has the advantage of these years. In addition, she has been receiving, up to the age usually of about twenty-two, severe mental discipline. She has to some degree learned to reason. She is supposed to have had the training which enables her to apply her mind to any given subject, grind it into atoms, and sift out of it its silver or its gold; or else prove that it is worthless. Applied to the subject Man, her judgment is likely to be better than that of any girl, even of the same age, who has not received a similar discipline.

But, after all, the sobering and enlightening effects of time and human experience are great on every soul. May it not be that if a public opinion can be developed which militates against early marriage, tending to make girls wait until they are well into their twenties before binding themselves with the vows of matrimony, the divorce muddle may be somewhat cleared?

Then, some interested one may ask, "would you advise long engagements?"

Many long engagements precede happy marriages; but, on the whole, an engagement of about a year only is counseled by most wise people. The general conclusion at which one must arrive is that the "first love," of which the chronicles of romance are so full, and which almost invariably attacks the human heart with overwhelming force during the later teens, should be resisted and overcome, and that a subsequent affection is likely to be wiser and better founded.

But though every thoughtful person must see, after reading the divorce statistics to which we have referred, that the age and experience of women have an important bearing upon this, one of the most puzzling and vital of our present-day national issues; yet the matter depends equally upon the man who marries the girl. What proportion of college-bred men, compared with those of the country as a whole, obtain divorces? Let them not poohpooh the matter as trivial. The matter must be probed to the root. The divorce-evil is not only eating out the heart of the American home, but it is bringing us into disrepute among the nations of the world.

At what age do you think, dear reader, as a general rule, our girls should marry? KATE UPSON CLARK.

Will China Become a Republic?

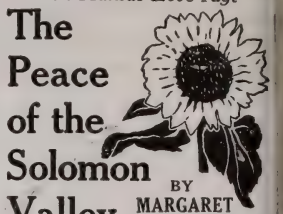
"Foreign heads of colleges and schools must give way to Chinese. The presence of the foreigner, even in positions requiring the highest technical skill, is no longer welcomed. A slight or an injustice to China by a foreign country or a foreign business concern is punished by a spontaneous and widespread boycott. With the slogan, "China for the Chinese," the people force the officials to buy back railway and mining concessions from foreign firms even though at an enormous loss. China's foreign indebtedness is $120,000,000. A Tientsin merchant proposes that it be paid off by popular subscription and organizes a national debt society. It spreads like wildfire over the country. The palace calls upon princes of the imperial household to subscribe half of their yearly income, merchants give their thousands of taels, coolies a part of their daily pittance, and even the little tots their copper cash.



"The nerve centre of this spirit of nationalism is the modern college. Almost every student dresses in a semi-military uniform. The government has recently been petitioned by students to furnish rifles to the government colleges. Circulars are constantly being distributed by student organizations among all government students, calling upon them to save the country. National affairs occupy among Chinese students the place which athletics, literary societies, fraternities and other college interests hold among students of the West. They discuss and settle and make recommendations to the government concerning the most perplexing national questions, such as the programme to be followed in Manchuria, the inauguration of constitutional government, the establishment of a fiscal system, or the adjustment of international railway loans. This spirit of nationalism is full of promise. Even in its least desirable forms, the spirit is social rather than selfish, and has in it the seed of nobility. It is possible to guide it into an intelligent patriotism which shall expend its first wrath upon a corrupt mandarinate and diffuse such a spirit of self-sacrifice throughout the land that the solution of every national difficulty shall become easy."

One section of the revolutionary party is said to favor the choice of Dr. Sun Yat Sen, a Chinese reformer of influence and ability, as president of the republic, should the movement be successful in central China. Dr. Sun is now in the United States. Among Chinese officials in this country, the republican idea is regarded as visionary and they assert that with Yuan Shi Kai in power, the rebellion will soon be crushed.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD FOR 1912

That famous divine, Joseph Parker, once remarked that the "front seats of his auditorium were in the Rocky Mountains and the back seats in the Himalayas." CHRISTIAN HERALD readers may say with Wesley, "The World is its Parish," for its activities literally embrace all lands. In the coming year, it will set before its readers the widest and most attractive variety of entertainment and instruction provided by any weekly magazine in the world.

The CHRISTIAN HERALD will begin next week the publication of a new and powerful serial story, entitled

"BRANDER CUSHING"

by the Rev. Charles M. Sheldon
Author of "In His Steps"

This new story "Brander Cushing" is a splendid and dramatic presentation of two of the greatest of our latter day problems. It is a story that will grip the hearts of its readers with interest, and will awaken their enthusiasm and admiration and hold them fascinated to the end. There is a beautiful love story running all through it. No more thrilling serial than "Brander Cushing," and no nobler characters than Sidney, his heroic son, and Pax Marston, the beautiful daughter of the Admiral, have ever appeared in modern fiction. The opening chapters will appear in Next Week's Issue.

Remarkable Features for the Coming Year:

Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady,

the author of so many successful historical novels, has written for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a stirring tale of the Frontier in the days when the life of the settler hung hourly in the balance. This story, which is full of the heroism, and, be it said, the spirit of self-sacrifice which characterized those days, will be continued through a number of issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It is an absorbing feature which will hold your attention from first to last.

Other Stories By Famous Authors will be announced during the year, among the contributors being Wilfred Grenfell, the Arctic hero and philanthropist; Eleanor H. Porter, author of Margaret and Marco; Florence Morse Kingsley, Cyrus Townsend Brady, Susan M. Griffiths, Miss E. L. Gebhard, Amelia E. Barr, Irving Bacheller, and many others.

A New Agricultural Development

Professor O. S. Morgan, of Columbia University, is preparing for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a series of articles which will have a particular application for every city and town in the country. It concerns the supply and demand of vegetable and fruit products as between cities and towns, and the producing sections in their immediate neighborhood. It contains a suggestion for abating somewhat the increasing cost of living. This series will be begun in early spring, and will be continued through several numbers.

Our Women Contributors

Special attention will be paid to the Women's Department of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and our Contributors' Staff this year will be larger than ever before, among them being Madeline S. Bridges, Kate Upson Clark, Miss Janet Porter (who conducts the Department for the Young), and Margaret E. Sangster, the counselor of the whole CHRISTIAN HERALD Family.

In the Footsteps of St. Paul

Dr. Francis E. Clark, now traveling in the Orient, has undertaken to write "A Journey in the Footsteps of St. Paul," exclusively for our readers. Dr. Clark is the founder of the Christian Endeavor Society. He will visit the "Seven Churches of Asia" and will record his impressions. His articles will be finely illustrated with photographs.

Our Bible Question Series

This attractive and helpful series of difficult Bible questions, which was extremely popular this year, will in 1912 be conducted as a regular monthly department. Every reader will have an opportunity to join this great Class for Bible Study.

Special Articles By Famous Writers will be a prominent feature for 1912. These will include Clayton Sedgwick Cooper, an authority on Bible propaganda, Professor Edgar J. Banks, Professor Mason P. Young, famous in Oriental travel; Rear-Admiral Charles D. Sigsbee of the Maine; Hon. Charles McFarland of the Federal Council of Christian America, who will write on the "Relation between the Church and Social Service"; John L. Harbour, E. Ryerson Young, son of the famous Canadian explorer, and others.

The American Pulpit

which has always been a strong feature of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will in the coming year be represented by sermonic contributions from the leading preachers of all the Protestant denominations. The fifty-two greatest sermons of the year will appear in its pages, among the contributors being C. M. Sheldon, Rev. C. H. Parkhurst, the Metropolitan divine; Dr. James Burrell, Rev. Wilbur H. Chapman, Professor R. A. Torrey, Rev. J. H. Jowett, Rev. A. C. Dixon, Bishops Quayle and Warren, J. Balcom Shaw, Charles F. Aked, C. A. Eaton, and Newell Dwight Hillis.

Art Masterpieces

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD possesses facilities for artistic printing such as no other religious family magazine can claim. During the coming year it will print, once a month, famous Art Masterpiece Covers, beautifully reproduced in colors. Copies of these splendid reproductions without lettering, will be made on extra size paper especially designed for framing. These extra copies can be secured for a merely nominal amount of postage. This collection of twelve of the World's Greatest Art Treasures will alone be worth more than the entire subscription price.

Special Article by Government Entomologist

Dr. L. O. Howard, Chief of the Bureau of Entomology, Washington, D. C., has promised to write for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an article on economic phases of the insect problem. Dr. Howard's work in the extermination of the Malarial Mosquito and the Typhoid Fly is widely known, and what he will have to say concerning other insect pests and how to get rid of them will carry with it the conviction of authority.

Our Missionary Contributors

There is no other paper with so large and varied a staff of missionary contributors as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. In every land it has its correspondents who write of the actual life of the missionaries, giving not theories but facts. All illustrate their letters with photographs taken with their own cameras. These contributors give a special value to the paper as a journal of world-wide missionary interest.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whether considered from its spiritual side or from the side of its mechanical make-up, is brighter and better than ever before, and during the coming year no pains will be spared to maintain this high standard. Every department will be conducted with the very keenest appreciation of the desires of our readers to have us produce a clean weekly newspaper for the home. Our aim is to make THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the very embodiment of religious and moral uplift, and so we ask you to help us extend that influence for good until it is felt in every home in the land.

The Christian Herald Almanac for 1912

Just compiled by us especially for our subscribers, contains, besides the regular Almanac features, a very complete compendium of valuable religious information. It contains a large amount of general statistics, particularly about the United States. It is lightened up by short stories, poems, anecdotes, wit and humor, making altogether a delightful and valuable year-book. A copy given free with each yearly subscription.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK CITY

Injunction and Invitation*

THE duty of urging the impenitent to come to Christ should lie heavily upon each and every one of us; but especially should you who are young seek to turn the thoughts of your unconverted companions toward their duty to God. It is in youth that the heart is most impressionable, and the mind most open to new thoughts. The vast majority of mature Christians sought the Lord in their youth.

Especially should you who are Sunday School teachers labor to bring into the church those under your charge. One successful teacher says that she always takes it for granted that her class are Christians. "We," she says to them, "are trying to make worldly ones become like Jesus." "We are setting an example to the ungodly." "We are sorry for those who do not know and cherish our beloved Bible." Thus they are insensibly, but often effectively, led to regard themselves as already soldiers on the Lord's side, and the transition into earnest church-members becomes far easier than if they had been treated as foes to be won over.

Mr. Biederwolf, the distinguished evangelist, tells of the sad funeral of a gay and beautiful girl of seventeen, who had never declared herself for Christ. As the heartbroken parents and friends stood around the open grave, a lady who had been a teacher of the dead girl, suddenly burst into uncontrollable sobs. The pastor, noting her emotion, hastened as soon as possible to her home in order to comfort her, and ask her why she should have been so completely overcome.

"Oh," she said, still weeping, "I so wickedly neglected speaking to her about her personal salvation. A month ago it rested upon my mind that I should speak to her of the welfare of her soul, but I postponed it, and now she has gone. But you—you, her pastor—you had spoken to her?"

He was silent for a moment. Then he confessed tremulously, "No. I saw how worldly and frivolous she was becoming, but I, too, postponed speaking. Let us ask God to forgive us both." And they knelt together.

The pastor then sought the parents. "You had talked with her of her soul. What did she say?" he inquired.

"We thought of it on her last birthday," they pleaded sadly, "but other things came up, and we neglected it, and now she is gone."

Yes, she had gone—to witness, perhaps, against those whose efforts should have been strongest and most constant to win the lovely girl to Christ's service. Let us see to it that no such crime against the Holy Spirit is ever laid to our charge.

Some one has made this homely but effective illustration of the value of personal work in soul-winning: He says, "If you want to fill a dozen bottles with water, take the necessary amount and throw it all at once over them. Again, take a dozen bottles and the same amount of water, and fill each bottle individually. Which method is the better?" The moral of this little parable is: Nothing compares with individual work to secure sure results.

Dr. Torrey tells us of a godly mother, who brought her own children up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, but who was constantly lamenting that she could not do a larger work for the Master. He discovered that her zeal was genuine, and that she was in the habit of speaking of the Saviour to almost every one who came to her house, in any capacity whatever; and that thus she was really doing more for Christ than were most pastors. Let us not be afraid to approach this subject with those around us.

*Topic of the Epworth League for Sunday, November 12. TEXTS: Rev. 22:17; Dan. 12:3.

Our Unseen Captain

IN a recent address before a great gathering of churchmen in England Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, after discussing the situation in the Church to-day, gave this eloquent conclusion:

"It shall come to pass that at evening-time there shall be light. Our direct concern for the Church of Christ will soon end, and it will end in light and peace. Now, said the apostle, is our salvation nearer than when we first believed. St. Paul sailed over a rough sea, knowing little of blue sky or calm water. But he knew that he and his were not drifting before the tempest. Their vessel was directed. The unseen Captain was on board; the close would be in the haven so long desired, and every day that haven was nearer, every day some part of the rough way had been accomplished for ever. Come what might, certain victories had been won and were secure, and the end was not to be a wreck on an unknown coast. God has a safe harbor for his troubled people, and while the waves toss we travel. We must somehow possess our past and our future in this way. We are on a voyage the days of which are numbered—the days of which are growing fewer. There will be light at evening-time whatever may befall us in the day.

If my bark sink 'tis to another sea.

And when we reach the shore we shall look back and recall our voyage—its storms, its sunshine, but, above all, its Captain; recall

The terrible, shamefast, frightened, whispered, sweet,
Heart-shattering secret of His way with us.

And so for the Church at evening-time it shall be light. The divine redeeming purpose will be accomplished, and then the building will be seen most worthy, and integral, and fair, the perfected intention of redeeming love. We know that the history of the Church has been a history of forward marches and of reluctant retreats, of success and repulse, of flood-tides and ebb-tides. But her Lord has rebuked her dark and faithless forebodings at eventide. If the Church has sometimes seemed to die, the death has been followed by a resurrection.

"Let us throw our thoughts forward, and be sure that at eventide there shall be light, that the end shall be an end of glory. 'Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to him who is God and Father; when he shall have put down all rule and all authority and power. For he must reign, till he hath put all enemies under his feet. The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death. For he hath put all things under his feet. But when he saith all things are put under him, it is manifest that he is excepted, which did put all things under him. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all.'"

HONEY BREAD

IN EUROPE, where the food value of honey seems to be much better understood than in the United States, enormous quantities are used. Of late years we seem to be waking to a realization of the value of honey as a wholesome and delicious article of food, and also as to its preservative qualities. Cakes and sweet-breads made with sugar soon become dry and crumbly, and to get the good of them must be eaten when fresh; but where they are made up with honey, they seem to retain their moist freshness indefinitely. In France honey bread a year or eighteen months old is preferred to that just made. They say: "It has ripened." It is the preservative, or rather the unchanging, quality of honey that makes it so popular with the best confectioners.

ARE YOU SATISFIED WITH YOUR INCOME?

Would $500, or more, a year on the side be an object to you?

You can easily make and exceed that amount in the poultry business without interfering with your regular work. Consumption of poultry products is fast over-taking production. The producers can not keep abreast with the needs of the increasing population. Now a billion dollars are spent annually for poultry and eggs. Why don't you get a part of that enormous sum? You can, if you will.

"Side-Line Poultry Keeping"

$1,188.05 is the amount F. H. Dunlap of West Salisbury, N. H. cleared from his hens in 1910, and did not devote more than two hours a day to them. You can learn the secrets of his success in the book, "Side-Line Poultry Keeping".

$1,009.31 was the net profit made by R. A. Richardson, Haverhill, Mass., in 1910, while attended to his regular work as a shoe cutter. The details of his success are also told in "Side-Line Poultry Keeping."

THIS RELIABLE BOOK

is by Edgar Warren, who writes in such a simple, pleasing manner that any novice can understand and follow the instructions which lead eventually to success. It is of special value to the person who desires to add several hundred dollars to his annual income without interfering with his regular work. It covers every detail of the business and its allied interests—hatching, brooding, selecting layers, feeding for growth and fertile eggs, dressing, shipping, selling, treatment for internal and external ailments, "Laying Down Eggs" for perfect keeping, etc., etc.

Subway Lots Bring Millions

SUBWAY FROM BROOKLYN TO NEW YORK

THERE is nothing more certain than the effect of subways on New York City real estate. The corner of 149th St. and Third Ave.—8 miles from City Hall—was assessed in 1900, before subways were built, for $7,914. In 1910, when the subway was completed, this same lot was valued by the assessors at $98,444, showing an increase of over 1100 per cent., and this is only one instance out of a great many.

Manhattan—Old New York—has had her subways. IT IS NOW BROOKLYN'S TURN. Our City officials have recently voted for the construction of a four-track subway into the densely congested districts of Manhattan, to be connected with the improved elevated and Subway lines of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Company. It will take a few years to complete this tremendous undertaking and there is always a possibility that a large city like this may fall short in carrying out all that it has promised, but we believe that our officials will see that every pledge is fulfilled, and we know that subways in Brooklyn will add millions and millions of dollars to its real estate values.

To-day we offer you Brooklyn lots—all of which are located within 2,500 feet or 10 minutes' walk of one of the subway routes approved by the Public Service Commission—as low as $890, and on a payment of $10 down and $7 per month. We will hold with you a large proportion of our land until these subways are well under way or completed, so that we, too, may obtain subway prices for a part of our holdings at least. Everybody knows that subways will bring millions to Brooklyn real estate—some doubt whether Brooklyn will get subways, notwithstanding the official act of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment.

We must meet this doubt and show our own faith by such a guarantee as will make you as nearly safe as we can afford to. If you are willing to divide your profits with us, and will read the guarantee below, you will see that by this guarantee you only run the risk of losing the interest on your money, for under the terms of same you can either get your principal back if you wish at the end of your contract, or have the alternative right to keep your lot and receive back all of the interest you have paid us.

Now, our selling prices have increased for the past ten years on an average of, perhaps, 10 to 20 per cent. a year without any material improvements in transportation, and this increase should go on through the normal growth of Brooklyn. This does not mean that the cash selling prices of Brooklyn lots have increased 10 to 20 per cent. each year—some years the cash price has increased much faster and some years not at all. We do not think you can afford to neglect to write us for fuller details of this plan or, better still, send first payment of $10 per lot to secure the best selection and remember that our offer also carries with it—high-class improvements free, free deed or return of money in case of death, free round trip (railroad fare) not exceeding $36, and a return of every dollar you have paid us if upon inspection of your purchase within one year you are in any respect not satisfied with your investment.

MONEY BACK IF NOT SATISFIED

Come to New York at any time within a year after you purchase, visit our properties, keep what you have if you think it is the best bargain of our $10,000,000 holdings, change to any other lot if you will or go to our cashier's desk and get back every dollar you have paid us. It is all the same to us. We would prefer to have you a good friend and not a customer rather than a customer and not a good friend; but a decision is required at the time of examination of the property and it is not extended to those who do not visit New York within the said year. In other words we do not give options. We do give you 12 months to examine your property and get your money back if you are not satisfied.

Our "FREE TRIP" and "MONEY-BACK" offers are both limited to one year from date of purchase.

OUR "BROOKLYN SUBWAY GUARANTEE"

If you will agree to give us one-half the profits on your investment, we will guarantee that before the monthly installment period [as provided in your contract for the purchase of lots] is completed, rapid transit trains will be running within 2500 feet of your lot into the densely congested district of Manhattan for a 5c fare. [Many lots are nearer, but this is the maximum distance]. You can buy your lots if you want to without this guarantee, but if you are in doubt, this guarantee should certainly remove the doubt. If rapid transit trains are not running, as aforesaid, by the end of said installment period, we will agree to either take your lot off your hands at the original price you paid for it, or, at your option, pay you six per cent. interest on your money for the entire period it has been in the property and let you keep the lot. Three plans are open to you:

1. Buy without the guarantee and keep all the profits.
2. Agree to give us one-half of your profits and, in case the subways shall not be built, as above guaranteed, take back the price you paid us, or
3. Keep your lots and take 6 per cent. in cash.

This guarantee is limited to purchases made before January 1st, 1912; will be incorporated in the agreement of purchase and contain one condition, namely, that we shall have the right to sell the property at any time when a profit of not less than 100 per cent. on the cash invested can be secured.

The "Lyric" Hornless Graphophone

AMONG the Columbia Graphophones and Grafonolas between $17.50 and $200, these two hornless Graphophones are as notable as they are new.

You cannot afford to purchase any musical instrument before you have seen and heard the Columbia "Lyric" or "Ideal" and made your own comparisons. In them "the one incomparable musical instrument" has been brought down to its economical limit, without sacrifice of the tone quality that distinguishes the modern Columbia from its predecessors and competitors.

Like all Columbias, they play Columbia (or any other) disc records.

If you don't own a record-playing instrument, now is the one best time to do it. If you do own one, exchange it. Any Columbia dealer will quote you a liberal allowance.

It's not a day too early to get that one most important Christmas gift provided for. Get it settled. Select a Columbia outfit, records and all, and guard against the delays of the December rush.

Let us send you the new Columbia catalog of instruments at $17.50, $25, $35, $50, $100, $150 and $200, together with the new 184-page catalog of Columbia Records comprising every class of good music, including exclusive recordings by Nordica, Fremstad, Nielsen, Bispham, Josef Hofmann and scores of others.

McCall's Magazine

The greatest woman's fashion journal in America. Has over one million subscribers —more than any other similar publication. Besides showing all the latest designs of McCall Patterns, each issue is brimful of sparkling short stories and most helpful information for women. McCall's is a large, artistic, handsomely illustrated hundred-page monthly periodical that no woman can afford to be without. If you wish to save money and keep in style, subscribe for McCall's Magazine at once. Any one of the celebrated McCall Patterns (value 15 cents) free with each subscription. Select your free pattern from your first number of McCall's. McCall Patterns lead all others in style, fit, simplicity, economy, and number sold. More dealers sell McCall Patterns than any other two makes combined.

The Housewife

The Housewife is exactly described by the name it bears, being edited with a view to giving the woman, who has the care and development of her home at heart, valuable suggestions and assistance. The department devoted to Cookery always contains practical, seasonable and tasty recipes. The Fashion Department, recently enlarged, displays the most desirable and fetching styles. The Social Circle, a special department, found in no other magazine, is used by Housewife readers as an interchange of ideas for home decoration, amusement, hints in economy, health, etc. The many serial and short stories are interesting and wholesome, effectively illustrated. Handsomely printed with beautiful colored covers. A magazine the arrival of which the reader looks forward to each month with interest.

People's Home Journal

By bringing good literature within the reach of the reading public of this country, The People's Home Journal has probably done more than any other popular fiction and home magazine to help build up the American home into the great national bulwark that it is to-day. For the past twenty-five years fathers and mothers have looked to The People's Home Journal for their reading and the reading for their children. This magazine has had a wonderful influence for good in every one of the homes—almost a million—into which it goes. It has become famous for its brilliant serial and short stories. Then you will also find all kinds of departments to cover a multitude of home subjects, such as cooking, care of children, entertainment, latest styles in clothing and newest fashions in needlework.

Pictorial Review

claims pre-eminence among women's magazines for four reasons: First, for its fashions, which are easily the most up-to-date, correct and most practical of any magazine published anywhere. Second, for its common-sense, essentially helpful, practical home and household departments, which cover the whole field of housekeeping and its problems. Pictorial Review devotes more space to this subject than any other magazine in this country. Third, for the wealth and interest of its art and literary sections. Pictorial Review stories are good stories, better and more interesting, stronger stories than you are apt to find in the pages of other women's magazines. Fourth, last, but not least, for its uplifting, instructive special articles bearing on home problems by the best and most popular writers

Ladies' World

This is the big year of the Ladies' World. 1911-1912 marks the 25th year of its existence. Nothing has been left undone to make the Ladies' World during the coming year run far ahead of its record for any previous year. The magnificent list of writers and illustrators, rich array of magazine material and the ever valuable departments will make the Ladies' World almost indispensable to you during this —its Silver Anniversary Year. The December Jubilee Number will contain an especially written commemorative poem by Edwin Markham, especial articles by Speaker Champ Clark of the House of Representatives and Mrs. Robert M. LaFollette, Strickland Gillilan's reminiscences, stories by John Luther Long, Florence Morse Kingsley, Beulah Marie Dix and the beginning of an entrancing serial by Edith Barnard Delano.

American Boy

The great magazine for boys. Give it to your boy. It will appeal most to his finer sensibilities than the tawdry, soon-forgotten gifts. It trains him to live and think right. The American Boy contains stories written by men who understand the American boy—stories of adventure, skill, travel, history, biography and world events, beautifully illustrated. Proper amount of sports and games and departments of photography, electricity, stamps, curios, carpentry, how to do things and how to make things, and it has a department devoted to the Boy Scouts of America, to which Ernest Thompson Seton, Chief Scout, contributes an illustrated page each week. It is the biggest, brightest and best magazine for boys in all the world. The American Boy is eagerly read by 500,000 intelligent, manly American boys.

Current Literature

Current Literature is an illustrated review of the large events and important utterances of the month. It is so in touch with the changing world that even its editor cannot tell what subjects will be treated by it one month ahead. The great currents of thought and action, in politics and industry, in science and religion, in literature and the drama, are all brilliantly mirrored in its pages. It sweeps the whole field, in both hemispheres, as no other magazine in the world has ever before done, and gives you the interpretations on all sides of all vital questions. The chief departments of Current Literature are: A Review of the World, Persons in the Foreground; Science and Discovery; Music and Drama, and Religion and Ethics.

Lowest Price Magazine Club Offers

The present season, 1911-1912, shows many changes in our magazine clubbing offers. A number of publishers have found it necessary, because of improved magazines and increased cost, to raise their prices. The popular $1.00-a-year magazines have, within the last year or so, all been advanced in price to $1.50 per year, and 15 cents per copy. Our old contracts with these publications have expired, and their wholesale rates to us have been increased. We are, therefore, unable to duplicate many of the offers of last year. However, we still lead in offering our subscribers the very lowest priced magazine bargains. Our 1912 Almanac is sent Free to each Christian Herald new subscriber, and to all old subscribers when they renew their subscriptions.

We especially call attention to the descriptions of these publications on the margins of this page. Of the entire group perhaps the Pictorial Review has made the greatest strides within the last couple of years. It has improved immensely in editorial quality, and is one of the most interesting publications in the woman's field. The Metropolitan has undergone a radical change in character as well as size. Its plans for the coming year are extremely interesting. The Success Magazine has undergone many changes during the past year. It is now under new management, and it will continue to be one of the most valuable magazines in its field. The American Boy, Little Folks, and Modern Priscilla are all old favorites with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers.

Success

The only home magazine that is not a woman's publication, a children's paper or a farm journal. It has recently been combined with the National Post and the united magazine for 1912 promises a remarkable assortment of strong, live articles on the questions of the hour, and stories by our best fiction writers, old and new. Among the magazine's special features for 1912 are Orison Swett Marden's inspiring editorial articles; a vigorous, readable review every month of the world's leading events and chat about the striking personalities of the hour; Mrs. Curtis's Home Corner and Pin Money Papers for women readers, twelve fearless, progressive editorials on the questions before the people; hints to prospective investors; and, by no means least welcome to our readers, a page of the month's best anecdotes.

Review of Reviews

Fifty magazines condensed for busy people. Always necessary, it is absolutely indispensable in these times of stirring public affairs, to the man who thinks and wants to know what is going on around him. It brings together the best that is in all the other important magazines and explains, through Albert Shaw's timely editorials, political issues, persons and all noteworthy events which you must know about. It is always fully informed, interestingly written and splendidly illustrated. Because, as they say, "they cannot do without it," intelligent men and women have given the Review of Reviews the largest subscription list in the world among the magazines not publishing fiction. The "Progress of the World" and "Leading Articles of the Month" are two of the most important features of each issue.

Metropolitan

The Metropolitan is now published in a new size, 10¾ x 14 inches. The new size is not a mere change of inches; it is a great, important step towards the national magazine of the future. The new-size Metropolitan has set itself to restore the appeal to good taste. It sets out, first of all, to supply literature; in the second place humor; in the third place, human feeling. If it supplies those three elements, you may be sure it will also give the reader more knowledge of life than all the sensational articles and muckraking attacks can produce in a thousand years. Important and timely articles by authoritative writers will be a special feature of the New Metropolitan. Finley Peter Dunne, the famous creator of "Mr Dooley," will be a regular contributor, under the heading, "From the Bleachers." Stirring fiction will be a strong feature

Little Folks

In Little Folks magazine love and joy and goodness are presented in stories of real and imaginary children and creatures and things. Besides the wholesome stories, there are charming pictures, sunny little poems, and suggestions to keep children happily busy in beneficial work or joyous play. Little Folks is a blessing to every mother and child, for it helps children mentally and morally, while it amuses them. Every child will love the magazine, and remember the donor with gratitude.

Farm Journal

is the standard farm and home paper of America: made for housekeepers, boys and girls, as well as fruit-growers, truckers, poultrymen, stockmen, dairymen, suburbanites and village people. It has always "stood up" for women. It is clean, brief, bright, "boiled down," intensely practical. "Cream, not skim-milk," is its motto. It is thirty-three years old, and known everywhere. "Judge Biggle" and "Peter Tumbledown" are characters better known to many than Hamlet or Micawber. Its poultry department is famous.

Modern Priscilla

First, last and all the time, the best Fancy Work Magazine published in America, if not in the world. A practical instructor and reliable adviser in every branch of feminine handicraft known to women, including all kinds of embroidery, crochet, knitting, lace, bead work, basketry, stenciling, oil, water-color and china painting, art leather work, art brass work, pyrography, etc. Every number is profusely illustrated with beautiful original designs and full-size details of stitches. Besides fancy work, The Modern Priscilla provides its readers many specially edited departments.

World Evangel

Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are Sunday School teachers or scholars should not fail to include The World Evangel in their combination magazine orders. The Evangel is the leading Sunday School magazine. It makes teaching delightful and effective, its fund of anecdotes enabling the teacher to interest scholars of all grades. Its International Lesson Study Department provides the best available exposition and information, and its lesson-teaching department is divided into Adult, Intermediate and Primary Department. The Evangel will save time and increase your efficiency

Outlook

During the coming year the Outlook will be of more importance to you than even during the last, as the discussions in the political field will be of greater interest, due to the approaching presidential election and the outcome of the Taft policies. Of course, Mr. Roosevelt will write in his trenchant editorials on great public questions of the day. In these articles he will continue to discuss the movements for clean politics, honest business, and popular rule. Not even the editors of the Outlook themselves agree with all that Mr. Roosevelt writes, but every one must agree that what he writes commands attention. You will enjoy the Outlook, for it is unquestionably one of the best edited and illustrated periodicals in existence. Do not forget that the Outlook, with its 52 issues, includes the 12 double magazine numbers.

NOTE—The matter on this page describing the Magazines is supplied by their respective publishers, for the information of our readers
WE WILL REFUND THE MONEY paid for any Magazine, including The Christian Herald, if you find such Magazine undesirable in your home

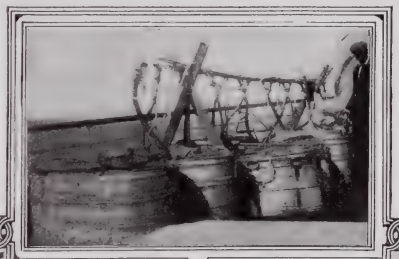
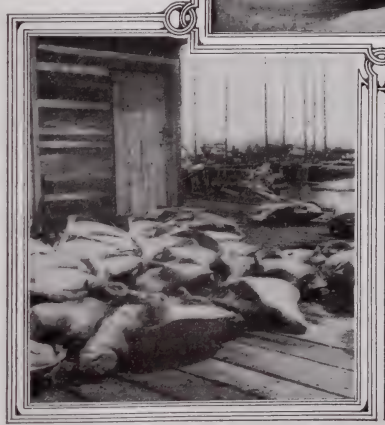
HUNTING THE RAINBOWS OF THE DEEP



AS FINE a lot of fish stories as ever came off the deep blue sea were brought ashore in New York a few weeks ago when two young men nded from the Mallory liner Comal after a fish-inting expedition in the tropic waters of the traits of Florida, just south of Key West. This a fish story too, but like theirs it can grow only as e fish of which it tells flourish at the Aquarium Battery Park, New York. This fish-hunting ip—for you see there is a great difference be-veen fish-hunting and just fishing—was made by r. Danforth B. Ferguson, who financed the ndertaking, and Mr. Chapman Grant, the assist-nt director of New York's Aquarium.



This is the first collection of tropical fish to be rought to North America from the hunting-rounds of the West Indies. Bermuda has up to e present time supplied most of the finny beau-es and curiosities that have been shown to the ublic. Mr. Grant was found a few days ago at is desk in the office of the old Aquarium, and ith the enthusiasm f a typical collector e told of the interest nd adventures of the ecent trip and showed ith pardonable pride s results as they wam in the great glass anks. The method of atching these fish, hich must be brought ninjured from their ropic homes, is that of rapping. A great eart-shaped wire bas-et baited with crawfish s lowered to the ocean loor to await the hun-ry beauties that are ure to come to it. The eculiar idiocy of all ish is taken advantage f in the formation of he trap. The opening n the basket work is at he top between the lobes f the heart and the fish nust swim downward o enter; but once he as gotten inside he ill nose around the ottom hunting for a ay of escape, and will seldom if ever swim upward to come out the way he went into his prison.

Mr. Grant's description of the home from which these tropic fish have been brought glows with all the color that we associate with the exotic products of the sub-tropics. "Looking through a glass-bottomed box at the floor of the ocean," Mr. Grant says, "the smooth coral bottom is plainly visible, with here and there a patch of short eel-grass and a great group of coral heads, which vary in size from that of an egg to many feet in diameter, and in color from pure white to rose-pink and purple. Here and there one will see patches of worthless sponges and great brown loggerheads. Bright red sea-stars, striped with yellow, and long waving red plumes diversify the bottom, and are surrounded by the gorgeous fish which give the final touch of beauty to this strange scene. The shoals are made up of huge round living coral heads which stand in clusters, together with smaller ones interspersed like beautifully colored soap bubbles, and in the interstices lie 'sea eggs,' the long-spined sea urchins, which keep their barbed spines slowly circling about in warning to any trespassers. The effect of depth in the clear water is very deceptive. Between the coral heads from place to place there is a 'white hole' with a white coral sand bottom, and possibly you will see what you call out to your more experienced companion is a nice little grouper; but when the experienced fisherman takes the water-glass and proclaims your find to be a sixty-pound jewfish, you look again and can hardly realize that there is such a difference in depth between the white hole and the coral heads. On taking the spear and making a futile jab you realize that to a novice the differences in depth are as deceiving as a moonlight perspective. The real wonders of these depths are the fish, for you see through your glass-bottomed bucket almost as clearly as through air the brilliant parrot-fish, blue tangs, hummingbird-fish or blue-heads, Spanish hog-fish, butterfly-fish,

THE HARVEST OF THE SOUL

TEXT: Gal. 6:8—"Be not deceived; the Lord is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

TO THE mystery of life and death, let us hasten to add the mystery of growth. When Demosthenes exclaimed: "Yesterday I was not here; I shall not be here to-morrow; to-day I am here," he suggested a hard problem. Having solved the enigma, what went before life, and answered that mystery, what follows after death, there still remains this question: "How can a babe in twenty years take on due proportions of the great orator and reformer?" Rocks do not grow, nor diamonds, nor dirt, but a shrunken bulb does become a lily, and the tiny seed a mustard tree. In vain does the scientist struggle with this problem: how an acorn can expand into an oak; how in a single summer a grain of corn can ripen a thousand grains, like that from which the cornstalk sprang.

Men are indeed familiar with the bursting of buds, the cracking of eggs, and the growth of children; yet familiarity robs these facts of no whit of their mystery. No jeweler ever goes into the field with a basket of watches to plant them in rows, expecting when autumn hath come to pick two or three wagon-loads of stem-winders from iron branches; yet, were this possible, it would be no more strange than that in the autumn the husbandman should stand under the branches to fill his basket with peaches or bunches of figs. For wise men it is no more difficult to think of a growing engine than of a growing oak. What if to-morrow an engineer should plant a cannon ball. Having watered it well and kept the ground loose through a hoe or spade, suppose that when a few weeks have passed the outline of a smokestack should push through the soil, to be followed a little later by a rudimentary steam whistle, the outlines of a boiler, and, rising through the sod, rude drive-wheels, piston rod, and cylinders, until after six months the great engine should stand forth in full completion. This phenomenon would be no more wonderful than that which actually goes on before man's blind eyes, when a tiny seed enlarges into the big tree of California and constructs a vegetable engine that lifts thousands of hogsheads of water up to the topmost boughs without any rattle of chains or din of machinery.

Growth and Intelligence

With difficulty man constructs that musical instrument called a mouthharp, but nature in six weeks out of a little blue or brown egg constructs a feathered music-box that automatically conveys itself from tree to tree. But the mystery that has gone on in that tiny blue egg lying in the nest is just as great as if some housewife had planted an old spinning-wheel in the full expectation of reaping a Jacquard loom, or buried a jews-harp in the garden expecting in the fall to pick a grand piano. To the mystery that is involved in enlargement by growth must be added the mystery of intelligence. It is not an easy thing for an expert housewife, using the same formula, always to achieve the same happy results in the white loaf. Yet he who plants a strawberry seed will find that the tiny seed will construct a plant, lay in the red tints according to rule, and mix the flavor of the berry to a nicety that is the despair of the chef. In the tropic forests there is a flower with a deep cup and the pollen at the bottom. This pollen lies upon a little platter, and underneath the platter is that form of trap known as the figure four, much loved by boys. When the bee, creeping down into the flower, touches that platter, it springs the trap that throws the fertilizing pollen upon the legs of the bee, to be conveyed to the next flower. Wise men can indeed imitate this, but a single seed will in a few months construct many scores of these mechanical devices. To-morrow morning the embryologist in his laboratory will place an egg under a glass cylinder in an atmosphere of ninety-eight degrees. Four hours pass and suddenly the scientist perceives an atom in the heart of that egg give a quick lashing movement. Another moment witnesses two quick throbs. Growth has begun and in four months' time the young eagle with firm strokes will lift itself into the soft air. From the chamber of life and the chamber of death God hath never drawn the curtains. The chamber of growth is another most holy place in which God alone doth stand.

* Pastor of Plymouth Church (Congregational), Brooklyn, N. Y.

Deeply impressed by the fact of growth, scientists have also marveled at the principle that controls the harvest. Rocks enlarge by accretion, but from what a rock is at the beginning, the geologist cannot tell what will be the shape of that rock when all deposits are finally made. As to growth in seed and shrub, like produces like. He who sows wheat reaps wheat, not tares. He who plants a grape receives a purple cluster, not a bunch of thorns or thistles. He who sows honor shall reap confidence. He who sows frankness shall reap openness. No Peabody sowing industry and thrift reaps the harvest of indolence and idleness. Theodore Parker, loving knowledge and for it denying himself sleep and exercise, reaped wisdom, and also wan and hollow cheeks, while the iron frame and ruddy cheek are for the child of the woods who loves exercise in the open air. He who aspires to leadership and would have the multitude cheer his name, he who longs for the day when his appearance upon the street shall mean an ovation from the people, must make himself the people's slave, defy all demagogues, brave the fury of party strife, oft be execrated by politicians, and sometimes belittled by the multitude. Having sown self-sacrifice and love, he shall reap fame and adulation. For nature's law is universal and inexorable—like produces like. The sheaf is simply the seed enlarged and multiplied. The sowing contains the germ of all the harvests to be reaped.

The Reward of Treachery

The biographer of Benedict Arnold tells us of the despair of the traitor's final days, the remorse that gnawed his heart, the agony that filled his life. But no arbitrary decree was imposed upon Arnold. He plotted the surrender of the interests committed to him as a general, planned the stratagem that ended in the capture and execution of André, and received $30,000 in gold for his treachery. Having gone over to the enemy, he placed himself at the head of a band of English troops and went forth to destroy the towns and villages of his boyhood and pillaged the homes of his old friends. He sowed avarice, and of avarice he reaped $30,000. He sowed distrust in America; he reaped distrust and dishonor from those who had bought his honor. He sowed treason, he reaped infamy. He sowed contempt for the colonists, and, dying, he reaped the contempt from his old friends, who counted his body carrion. For the harvests of the soul represent not arbitrary decrees, but the workings of the natural law. If Ceres, the goddess of harvests, makes the sheaf to reap the seed, conscience, recalling man's career, ordains that like produces like. What a man soweth, that shall he also reap, is the law of nature and God.

Carlyle has called the heroes of the Old Testament "common people capitalized." What is unique in the experience of these sons of greatness holds true of all of lesser rank. The career of one of these giants is a pictorial exhibition of this principle of the spiritual harvest. Young Jacob was shrewd, crafty, and full of foresight. If Esau, his brother, was a "hail fellow well met," the child of his impulses, Jacob was a diplomat, and very wily. One day, when the father Isaac was blind and old, Esau grew restless, and at last went away with his companions, for he dearly loved to hunt. In that hour ambition tempted Jacob and avarice led him away. Advantaging himself of his brother's absence, Jacob used the skin of a kid to make his hands hairy like the hands of Esau, and, simulating the brother's voice, he extorted from his dying father those tokens that, according to the Eastern custom, made him the successor to his father's title, wealth and power. Full two-score years passed swiftly by, and the deceit seems to have brought in large money returns to crafty Jacob.

Jacob's Sowing and Reaping

But silently nature was working out the harvest of retribution, through that law of heredity that makes sons repeat the qualities of their father. When Jacob was now advanced in years his ten sons began to develop craftiness, and soon they plowed great furrows of care in the father's face. In those days of care his young son Joseph stole into Jacob's heart like a sweet sunbeam, and, with his open, loving ways, filled his father's heart with gladness. But when the elder brothers knew Jacob had given Joseph a coat of many colors they remembered the craft of their father in his early career. One evening, when the herds and flocks were scattered widely over the hills, Simeon sent out messengers and called his brothers together for a conference. In that hour he said: "Wist ye not how our father, being a younger son, supplanted his elder brother Esau? And, behold, his craft will now make his younger child, Joseph, to supplant his elder brothers. Do ye not remember how our father Jacob took a kid and made his hands like unto the hands of Esau? Let us now take a kid and make its blood represent the blood and death of Joseph. What Jacob did for his father Isaac, let his sons do to their father Jacob."

Thus, with subtle irony, nature made the man's sins come back to him. Once the boy Jacob deceived his father; now, grown gray and old, his boys brought their father an armful of deceits. In that hour when Reuben and Simeon held up the coat of many colors, all red with blood, great Nature might have whispered to Jacob: "It is the blood of the kid that you slew for deceiving your father that now returns, enabling your sons to deceive you." For having sowed deceit, deceit also and stratagem Jacob reaped. Himself a son, he thrust a dart into his father's heart; become a father, his ten sons became archers, skilled with darts that filled their father's heart with agony. For nature loves justice; her rule is law, and sometimes her rod is iron.

History permits no man to escape the reflection that if, for the time being, individuals have escaped this moral law, nations have felt its full force. Nature does indeed walk through the fields with footsteps so gentle as to disturb no drop of dew hanging upon the blades of grass. But nature also hath her sterner aspect, and for the sons of iniquity her foot war and of pestilence.

The Retribution of Nations

When Sophocles, in a great tragedy, worked out steps are earthquakes, her strokes are strokes of the law of moral retribution for King Edipus and Antigone his daughter, the poet might well have gone on to note that if the Grecian army had sacked the Trojan cities the time would come when the Roman fleet would sack her cities and make her sons to toil as captives. Later on, if the Roman conquerors swept the East for corn and wheat, looted stores and shops, pillaged palaces for treasure, for triumphal processions, the time came when nature and God decreed that the vast wealth piled up in the Roman capital should excite the cupidity of the Goths, until at last the streets of that great city were swept with flame and storehouses were pillaged by marauders. In reviewing the history of Venice Ruskin was so impressed with this principle of the moral harvest that he affirms that the history of palace and cathedral, of fleets and navies, is simply the story, written by a pen dipped in fire and blood, how the children reaped what the fathers had sown.

He notes that in the last century the English governors, for example, Warren Hastings, went through India, robbing the Rajahs, despoiling the people by false weights and measures, until they were turning the whole country into one vast desert. The hour came when before the House of Commons Burke impeached Hastings for high crimes and misdemeanors, as the enemy of India and England and all men. But England was content to impose a trifling fine upon her wicked official. Years passed and an injured people brooded upon its wrongs, and the time came when what England had sown in tears she reaped in blood. One day the Indian soldiers mutinied. The next day the wells were filled with the bodies of English officials, their wives and children; then merchants and missionaries and travelers were slaughtered. For weeks the strife went on. If once the English soldier had pillaged the Indian villages, now, in turn, the English quarters were pillaged. "Blind of eye and hard of heart," says Gladstone, England had refused to learn the lesson.

O all ye young hearts, know that it is safe to do right; it is dangerous to sow wrong! No matter how smooth, how soft and sweet, seem the paths of

As to Being Born Again

IN the natural man there is always room for improvement. Natural birth is not more essential for natural life than spiritual birth is for spiritual life. Life in this world is a free gift, but if we would be worthy of that greater and better life we are admonished to earnestly seek for it.

Why life in this world is considered so priceless by many, why spiritual life that is far better is sought after by so few, notwithstanding the fact that whosoever will may seek and find if so disposed, is not an easy question to answer. In this matter of spiritual life we have ways and means. We can see and perceive truth to our entire satisfaction. We can know that to be born of the Spirit of God means something. We can see that those so blest are so changed in appearance and character that they appear to be "new creatures" within and without.

Now, the man of the world says, "Yes, I see. To be born of the Spirit makes a decided change, and, in fact, too much of a change for me; for I am in the world for all there is in it. Later in life, when passion and appetite subside; when the world and its pleasures become insipid; when I have less sacrifice to make, I will seek this good way then." It is said that "Procrastination is the thief of time." When that day comes, irresolution and discouragement will come also; the Spirit will have fled, the golden opportunity passed, and the power for evil will be master of the situation. The hopeless one then finds John Bunyan's "iron cage" a reality, easy to get in, and hard to get out of.

We are told that God's Spirit will not always strive with man. In Eccles. 12: 1 he is admonished in these words, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, and the years draw nigh in which thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them." In that day the hopeless one finds life a burden to a wasted body and a restless soul. There is no pleasure in life, no hope in death.

It is true, there is mercy reserved for the eleventh hour; but how few in that day seek for it! As a great congregation the youthful and worldly seek for death more earnestly than the wise seek for life. The worldly do not fear death; they seek for it thoughtlessly. As it is written, they "wander from the way of understanding" to remain among the congregation of the dead.

Those who have sought and found the one thing needful have some conception of its value. The way to obtain it is plain, simple and direct; moreover, we know that those who find it, find the only truly great blessing there is to be had in the world. And that is to be born of the Spirit of God—to know Jesus Christ as one's personal Saviour, whom to know is life eternal. That is the birthright of every one who faithfully seeks for it.

No other save the true Christian is so blest. Others may believe, hope and fear; the Christian can feel, hear, taste, see and know that he is accepted, blessed and possessed. And to make his faith and peace complete, the Great Seal is fixed, namely—the love of God. He knows that God loves him and he loves God. And there is nothing unusual about that. The Father loves the children begotten of him just as the mother loves her offspring. In I. Cor. 2: 9, it is written: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for those that love him." What a consoling text we have here in that one word "love!"

What a blessing there is here in the world and further on, before the true Christian! In harmony with the written Word, he can say to his peace and joy—"I know that I am the temple of God. I know that I have been purchased with a price. I know that I am not my own. I know the Good Shepherd and the Good Shepherd knows me. I know that I have passed from death unto life, and that I have with me the Anchor of the soul sure and steadfast. An open door is before me; no man can shut it. I am on my way to the Evergreen Mountain of life, the 'everlasting habitations.' To me the peaceful present, the sacred past, the hopeful future are one. I have but a faint idea of the glory of eternity. Here, in the twilight of life, in faith, love and blessed assurance, I anxiously await his summons."

Oh for language to express the love, peace and joy that God alone can give!

Ministers' Salaries

"THE inadequacy of the salary of multitudes of clergymen is one of the dark features of our modern Christendom," writes the Rev. Charles E. Jefferson in the Congregationalist. "Most ministers prefer to suffer in silence rather than hint that their income is insufficient. This is one reason why many a minister is poorly paid. The chauffeur speaks out, so does the coachman, the gardener, the bookkeeper, the foreman, the cook; consequently their wages are raised. The clergyman does not speak out, and hence his salary remains what it was. The church grows, the cost of living increases, the wealth of laymen multiplies, but the preacher goes on working for the same old pay because he does not speak out, and because his people do not consider.

"There are thousands of churches which pay their minister generously, keeping his salary at the level of their ability, sometimes even beyond. There are thousands of other churches which are paying their pastor all they can, and therefore all they ought, but whose best is not enough. In many a community there are too many churches. If six churches struggle for an existence where only two are needed, then some of the ministers are sure to suffer. This is a tragedy of human manufacture and can be ended. There is enough inevitable misery in this world without adding to it needlessly. Self-sacrifice will always be called for, but there is no reason why we, by our folly, should create new demands for it. Many of the feeble churches should be consolidated, and whenever a non-self-supporting church is a necessity to the welfare of the community, the denomination should look after it, and see that its minister and his family are able to live in dignity and comfort. It is a scandal on the church of Christ if in a Christian land, in an age of boundless wealth, any of its ministers are compelled to work financially handicapped and tortured. The church as a whole must bear the burdens of the churches which are weak. A denomination which does not care for its own is something worse than an infidel."

THE OPEN DOOR

WHERE are the friends of long ago,
Who have gone from earth away?
Our dear ones and our loved ones,
Oh, where do they dwell to-day?
Some have fallen by the wayside;
Some have gone on before,
Yet we may some day meet them
Close by the open door.

The years have been long and many
Since we bade them all good-by,
And we wait until He calls us
To our home beyond the sky.
Sometimes in the night I wonder
Shall we ever see them more?
And the answer comes so sweetly:
"They wait at the open door."

The way seems dark and dreary,
The sun is shining dim,
And I am tired and weary
And long to go to Him.
There wait the friends and dear ones
We loved in days of yore,
And I long to go and find them
At Heaven's open door.

There shall we rest forever,
There shall no sorrow come,
There shall we join our loved ones
In Heaven, our happy home.
Oh, what a glorious meeting,
When we reach that golden shore,
And meet the friends and dear ones
Who wait at the open door!

A New Story of H. W. Grady

IN ONE of his camp-fire talks, W. H. Ridgway relates this story of that brilliant American, the late Henry W. Grady, in Association Men:

"One day Mr. Grady said to his associates on the Constitution, 'I am going away for a week or so and I don't want any one to know where I am.' He disappeared. He went back to Athens to his mother in the old home.

" 'Mother,' said he, as he took her in his great, strong arms and kissed her, 'I have come home to you this time to be your own little boy Harry once more. I want you to treat me just like you used to in the old days. Cook me the little things I used to like. The little pie-dough cakes on the back of the stove, the ginger cakes with the raisins in the middle, the nice warm bread with brown crust and covered with molasses.'

"He would spend the days down at the old swimming hole, and out in the barn, where he would crawl all over the old gin and try to skin-the-cat on the pole. He would loaf around among the cabins and hear the colored folks talk and tell stories.

"In the afternoons he would come and lay his head down in her lap as she sat on the porch, and say: 'Mother, I want you to tell me the stories you used to tell me about Joseph and David and Elijah and Daniel. And tell me all over again about the shepherds and the star and the little Baby in the manger who came to make Harry a good boy.'

"When night would come he would call his mother into his bedroom and say: 'Now, mother dear, I want you to tuck Harry in and hear him say his prayers—'Now I lay me down to sleep.' Then he would say: 'Mother, set the light out in the hall and hold my hand in yours and sing me to sleep with:

"I think when I read that sweet story of old
When Jesus was here among men,
How He called little children the lambs of His fold;
I would like to have been with Him then."'

"For two weeks Henry W. Grady was 'little Harry' on the old farm with his mother. Then he went back to Atlanta. About this time came the invitation from the New England Society to come and speak at their great dinner. He came and spoke.

"That wonderful oration thrilled the land from one end to the other. It was the first time since the terrible war that the real South had spoken. Where did that great speech 'The Old South and the New' come from? After his death his mother told us just as I have told you. Said he afterward: 'When I found myself upon my feet every nerve was strung as tight as a fiddlestring and all tingling. I knew then I had a message for that assemblage. As soon as I opened my mouth it came rushing out.' "

How Much Does a Convert Cost?

MUCH attention has been directed to the published statement of a well-known evangelist, a few weeks ago, in which he gave what has been called a "tariff for souls," estimating the cost of conversions per capita in a number of American cities where he had held revival services. Proceeding upon the principle that there is a commercial as well as a spiritual side to religious work, he gave the following figures as the cost of making converts in the cities named:

City.	Cost Per Convert.
Atlanta	$75
New Orleans	78
Chicago	395
Boston	450
New York	545
Indianapolis	620

That it is beyond the power of man to estimate the value of a soul in dollars and cents, is beyond dispute. But the question has been brought up in a form which has developed to a large extent into an inquiry as to revival methods, the expenditures they involve and the general results. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has invited expressions of opinion on the subject from revivalists and leaders of Rescue and other Missions where the work is mainly of the evangelistic order. It gives below some of their replies and as they are the outcome of large experience, the letters will be found both interesting and instructive.

Evangelists, revival workers and pastors are invited to contribute their views to this discussion, not in a critical sense, but for the purpose of general enlightenment. It is a matter of vital interest to pastors everywhere, to ascertain whether the large amounts that are frequently spent on revivals are wisely expended or not. It is not in the proper sense a spiritual question, for as a gentleman long experienced in practical Christian work writes to us, "It is difficult to ascertain the cost of these revival meetings, because the expenses as a whole are not on file anywhere, especially the amount paid to the revival preacher."

From $14.26 to $200 in Washington

The cost of converting souls in Washington is pretty high. Many of the accessions to our churches are from the Sunday School scholars, and such are not expensive; but the average cost of maintaining churches, missions and similar institutions is rather expensive in this city. One church with which I am familiar receives for all purposes (including foreign mission work) about $20,000 per annum. The number of conversions, aside from the children in the Sunday School, is so inconsiderable as not to be mentioned.

Our Gospel Mission expended last year aside from the $6,500 paid on new buildings, repairs, etc., $5,500. The number of conversions reported was 116, the average cost of each being $47.50. The Central Union Mission of this city has just issued its report showing the expenses of work over $10,000; number of converts 700; average cost about $14.28. There are about 100 evangelical churches among the white folks, and I am sure that they cost an average of $5,000 a year, or $500,000 in all, to maintain them. I do not believe there is an average exceeding 25 accessions "by profession of faith" to each church, which would equal 2,500 persons, and at an average cost of $200.

This estimate is based upon an observation extending over thirty-five years in this city.

$15 to $25 in Rescue Mission Work

Personally, I am not surprised at the seemingly large estimate of $450 per convert in Boston, or any other large city, where noted speakers, musicians, singers and workers are employed. If we reckon these, together with all other expenses incurred, and count only the persons who join the church and become good members, the estimate is not so large after all. However, I can see how these figures would stagger the ordinary churchman in small cities and towns.

Drawing from my personal experience of over twenty-one years in Rescue Mission work and having, in the past six years, read the reports of about one hundred missions representing nearly every state in the Union, my conclusion is that the average convert costs between $15 and $25 in mission work.

$2 to $10 Here and in England

If I may speak from an experience of nearly forty years of evangelistic work I must say that it is a question of great difficulty. Impulse and zeal are often taken for conversion. It takes money to run the machinery of evangelism, but large amounts are practically wasted on speculation. While I was associated with Gipsy Smith in England and working in Beverly Road, Hull, I think the amount per convert then was estimated at $10 among those who were looked upon as being "down and out." Men who are called to go after the lost sheep go after them, without making a price with Christ. At Ewington and Steelton, Pa., myself and wife labored two years among the steel workers and seventy-two men and women professed conversion. If I may estimate the cost, I cannot put an expense above $2 per head.

Soul-Winners' Mission Averages $11 per Convert

Different conditions produce different results. Noah preached 120 years, without a convert outside of his own family, so far as we know. Peter preached one sermon and 3,000 persons were converted.

My work for many years has been, principally, among the Southern Highlanders—a people long neglected and many of them desperately wicked. Our Soul-Winners Society, supported by voluntary gifts from every source and from every land, has employed a number of godly men and women, and sent them as evangelists among these isolated people. We have kept a careful record of all work done, with the cost and results. Last year we spent $9,895.44 for the support of these missionaries, and they reported 860 conversions, which would make the cost of each one about $11.60.

During ten years, the expenses of our evangelists were some $68,462.95, and they reported 6,304 conversions, making a cost of about $10.85 each. I judge this is about a fair average of the cost of reaching these people the Gospel and securing the desired sult in their conversion.

A Home Mission Official's View

[The following letter is from prominent official in one of our g Home Mission Societies. His nam withheld, but we know his statem to be drawn from authorita sources.]

My own experience and observa have been largely in connection Christian work on our Western fi tier. Our 200 missionaries report ing the past fiscal year seventy- new churches organized and 9,683 fessed converts. These people h been Gospel neglected. The peopl our cities and large towns, perhap would be more proper to say, have come Gospel hardened, and are th fore more difficult to reach.

I have sometimes thought that s evangelists are over-paid, even tho it was a so-called free-will offeri The pastors, on the other hand, h steady hard work to do, and the av age salary is only enough to pay t running expenses. Our missiona average $850 each as salary.

I think permanent organizations the Salvation Army: Gospel Missi like the McAuley Mission, Bow Mission, etc., reach more people an less expense than these periodical tempts to gather in outsiders by called evangelistic meetings. I inclined to think that the net results these temporary extra evangeli gatherings in our churches do not for the expense and excitement volved. I think well of the tent wo however, in our cities and towns in summer, while some of our churc are closed.

Water Street Converts Average $2

It is impossible to place a moneta value upon a human soul. There some men who have been converted our Mission, whose transformation been so wonderful and their influe so far-reaching, that if we had acco plished no more in ten years than such conversion we would feel rep not only for the expense of running Mission, but for the time given as w We have about 5,000 men every ye who kneel at our altar service and terward confess Christ. We have way of finding out how many of th men remain true—the records are ke above—but we do know of many w do remain true. Three of our conve have been called to take charge of R cue Missions within the past f months, one in New York, another Brooklyn (this Mission was open through the influence of the Chapma Alexander meetings last February another has gone to take charge of t Yale Hope Rescue Mission in N Haven, Conn., run under the auspic of Yale University. Still another co vert has been called into the minist in South Dakota. Altogether the men did not cost our Mission $100.

We spend about $12,000 a year Water Street. This includes all of o expenses and so the average per co vert would be less than $2.50.

A Famous Art Masterpiece, Just Sold for $200,000

A VALUABLE addition has just been made to the art treasures of Great Britain by the purchase for £40,000 of the great picture, "The Adoration of the Kings," by Jan Gossaert or Jean Gossart of Maubeuge or Mabuse. We give the Dutch and French spelling of name and place. The trustees of the National Gallery in London have purchased this picture from Rosalind Countess of Carlisle. It has long been known as "The Castle Howard Mabuse" and has been at Castle Howard for over a hundred years, since, in fact, it was purchased by the fifth Earl of Carlisle. The picture was painted about A.D. 1500 for the Abbey of Grammont in East Flanders; from 1605 onward it decorated the high altar of the court chapel at Brussels. Thence it passed into the collection of Prince Charles of Lorraine, governor-general of the Low Countries, and later into that of the Earls of Carlisle. The picture is about seven feet by six feet, and it is undoubtedly one of the masterpieces of Flemish fifteenth-century art. The artist of this great picture, Jan Gossaert, was the son of a bookbinder of Maubeuge. He was born about 1472 in this small town in Hainault. In 1508 he went to Rome with his patron, Philip of Burgundy, Admiral of Flanders. In 1526 he designed the tomb of Isabella of Austria, Queen of Christian II., which was placed in the abbey church of St. Peter at Ghent. Gossart died in 1523. One of his most celebrated pictures was a large triptych representing "The Descent from the Cross."

FRIEND OF MINE

O FRIEND of mine, whom I shall see no mo
How little have the white sails borne to se
All that love wrought still lingers here wi me.
Still, still we stand together by the shore.
Now hath God blessed me as the blind are ble
Who, losing sight, have lost one sense alon
For all the powers of my soul are grown.
The vision vanished, memory keeps the rest,
And I have but to hark to hear thy song:
Be still to feel thy presence, cheer and grac
And in my dreams I see thy shining face,
Angel of God, to bid me still "Be strong!"

Brander Cushing's Ambition

A New Serial Story Written for The Christian Herald

By Charles M. Sheldon

Author of "In His Steps"

CHAPTER I.

THE Secretary of War had finished his speech and turned to the contractor with a gesture that he might signal the engineer to release the locking bars which held the monster warship on the ways. Then he looked with a smile in the other direction and motioned to a young woman standing there behind him to be ready for the christening of the vessel.

The girl stood there on the platform, which was built high up over the ship-yard floor, poised very erect and alert, a smile on her face and a proud look in her eyes, as she raised a bottle of champagne with a gesture of great animation. About the neck of the bottle fluttered a bow made of red, white, and blue ribbons.

On the platform with the Secretary stood a brilliant and distinguished group: Senators and Representatives, secretaries of the cabinet, members of the Naval Board, ambassadors and members of the diplomatic corps, army and navy officers, retired officers and famous fighters.

The sunlight struck through the openings about the immense enclosure of the ship-yard and flashed in vivid pictures the color of the uniforms and foreign dress of the representatives of other countries. There was a dazzling profusion of gold lace, plumed hats, scarlet trimmings, and gay braided garments on breast and shoulder and headgear. Over head fluttered innumerable pennants and streamers of red, white and blue, and a great flag was hung over the bow of the warship on one side, covering several square yards of the black steel surface.

The yard below was dotted with human figures. Workmen were at their places. On both sides of the vessel along the ways, thousands of spectators were gathered. The largest warship of modern times was about to be launched, and the event was memorable in the history of naval affairs.

A short, heavy-set man standing at the Secretary's left leaned over the edge of the platform and along the line of the vessel with a look of authority. His eye was steady and his appearance calm, but the moment was tense for him. This was Brander Cushing, the great contractor.

"Just a little to the right, please, Miss Marston," he said, leaning across the figure of the Secretary.

The girl moved forward slightly. "Yes. That's right, thank you. Now!"

She raised her hand for the signal to McNeil, the engineer, and the next instant the mass of 10,000 tons displacement began to move. It was hardly perceptible. But it was a majestic movement, that thrilled those who felt the distance widening between the platform and the smooth deck of the war vessel. It was slipping down the slight incline, and the girl, with a quick glance at the Secretary that included an answering gesture from him and Cushing, leaned gracefully forward and threw the bottle against the bow of the ship. At that instant the band struck up "The Star-spangled Banner," and all hats came off, while a roar of cheers went up from the masses along the river.

The bottle broke into a spattering glitter of glass, and the champagne fizzed down over the steel side. But the bow of ribbons, caught by a sudden strong gust of wind from below, flew up past the edge of the deck and, lifted by a capricious and vagrant zephyr, floated along down the platform past two young men who were standing together at the extreme end of the platform on the river side.

The ribbons were about five feet from the edge of the platform, but they were floating over the river, which was nearly seventy-five feet below. A chain and wood about posts protected the platform at that point, and the first young man leaned out over this chain and, with more than half his body flung over the empty space below, clutched at the ribbons as they sailed by, but missed them.

His companion had already stepped over the chain, and with one foot on the edge of the platform and one hand around the chain, he reached the other hand out over the river after the bow, which seemed like an animated thing coquetting with him, and whirling suddenly downward and away from him.

His hand seized the bunch of color and closed over it. But at the same instant his foot slipped and his hat fell off and went sailing down into the water. His hand still clung to the chain, and his face, as it turned upward as his body hung there, showed no trace of fear or even of surprise.

A dozen hands snatched at his wrist and arm. The first to get hold of him was the young man who had missed the ribbons, and his face was very pale as he helped to pull his companion up and drag him onto the platform.

"His hand still clung to the chain and his face . . . showed no trace of fear or even suprise"

An officer of the Marine Corps nearby was one of his helpers.

"Young man, that was a close call," he said, as he warned the people back from the edge of the platform.

The young man did not seem disturbed in the least. He put his hand up to his head and laughed at the loss of his hat.

The other young man looked at him soberly.

"I wonder you will run such risks, Sidney."

"Do you? I got the ribbons all right. Came near wetting them. I wonder if they are fast colors."

"They were fast enough when I tried to get them," said the other young man. His face was still pale and his manner more agitated than even the recent narrow escape of his companion would warrant.

The people were slowly moving off the platform, and the two young men walked along to the point where the Secretary was standing congratulating the contractor and shaking hands with a number of distinguished men. The warship had floated out into the river and was coming to a stop within ten feet of the point where the stolid McNeil had figured it would have to go.

The Secretary whirled about as the young men came up.

"Your son, Cushing?" he said, as the contractor looked at the young men in some surprise.

"Yes, sir. Sidney. I think he has met you."

"I remember him all right," the Secretary answered with a smile. "I would know him anyway. You look exactly alike." He shook hands in his hearty fashion, and Sidney seemed no more abashed than at the loss of his hat.

Speaking to his father but looking at the Secretary, he said:

"I had the misfortune to lose my hat just now."

"You shouldn't throw it up so high," said the Secretary, laughing.

"I couldn't help it," said the young man, and this time his glance traveled from the Secretary to the girl, who was at that moment talking to the other young man, and evidently laughing over the answer to her question about the absence of his friend's hat.

"You had better go out and get another hat, Sidney," said Brander Cushing, in a tone between disapproval of his son's appearance and fatherly pride in him.

"All right, father. But I don't know just where I can get one short of the Avenue."

"Let Gordon take you up there in his auto."

"He has all his seats filled. I'll go down on Moore Street and get back in time.

His father was about to remonstrate, but the crowd around the Secretary pressed up to offer congratulations and Sidney found himself close to the group surrounding the young woman who had christened the vessel.

"I have never met Miss Marston," he said.

Gordon Ford looked at him in surprise.

"What?"

"No. Never had the pleasure."

"I thought——" his friend began, and then seeing Miss Marston smiling expectantly, he introduced Cushing.

"My friend Sidney Cushing, Miss Marston. I thought you had met at the Assembly last year."

Sidney Cushing bowed very low.

"I would take off my hat, Miss Marston, but I have already done so."

"I see you have," she replied, laughing frankly. "But, pardon me. According to Mr. Ford, you didn't take it off, it was taken off for you. You ran a great risk."

"For a great prize," Sidney said, placing his hand over his upper coat pocket where he had put the little bow of ribbons.

The girl blushed and looked confused, and actually stammered some low remark that Sidney did not catch.

"Pardon me; I didn't catch your word. Those whistles are mighty impolite."

Out on the river the sirens on the yachts were still screaming around the new-comer that had just arrived among the floating palaces of the rich.

"You are not going to keep that little bow of ribbons, are you?"

"I am, unless you will perhaps give me something better."

He was astonished at his own unheard of audacity and wondering at himself to be talking thus to the daughter of Rear-Admiral Marston, when the girl suddenly turned and touched her father's sleeve. He had been talking earnestly with Senator Ford, Gordon's father.

"Father, will you meet Mr. Cushing? You were saying this morning, you know, that you wanted to meet him if he were here to-day. And here he is."

The Cost of Revivals

PASTORS and Christian workers everywhere are taking an active interest in the discussion which has been started by the recent publication of an interview with a sensational evangelist in which he gave the cost of conversions in different cities. Leaving aside for the moment the purely commercial aspect in which his "tariff for souls" seems to regard spiritual work, it is a question whether, on the whole, he has not unwittingly rendered a valuable service to the churches and to Christian workers in focusing attention upon a phase of which they have till now known but little. "Do revivals pay?" has been frequently asked by pastors who have just gone through an experience in their own churches which left them in a rather doubtful frame of mind. It is quite evident (we are now speaking in a purely commercial sense) that they pay somebody! In the earlier days when Whitefield, Finney and other great soul-winners held such meetings, the financial part was not nearly as prominent as we find it now. People then were comparatively poor; yet a rich harvest of grace—not of dollars for some one—marked those services. Those consecrated men did a great work and the financial cost so far as we have ever been able to learn was insignificant. Let any one compare the expenses in Moody's day with those of our modern revivals. Yet no one will maintain that Moody's work was not greatly blessed to the salvation of multitudes. One may see some of the material results of his labors in the Moody Institute at Chicago and the great work he founded at Northfield. If we may credit published reports, revivalists to-day receive sums that make Moody's income seem absurdly small. These latter-day offerings may be regarded as strictly personal; whereas in Moody's case, every dollar that came was devoted to the cause to which he had pledged his life. We hear nowadays of "guarantee funds" and similar arrangements under which those who subscribe for the work's sake have to make up deficits in income over expenditures, and the latter are frequently excessive. It looks altogether as though the "Lord's business" were becoming dangerously and daringly commercialized so that it might furnish big incomes. Is it any wonder that there is a general conviction that such work is not blessed as in former years, when the workers were genuinely fired with the "divine passion for souls" and willing to trust to the Lord to keep them going? While it is quite true that the laborer is worthy of his hire, it is a tremendous and incontrovertible fact that "ye cannot serve God and mammon."

A Humble Heroine

JUST a plain woman with a kindly face, stout arms and a brave heart; a woman with a high sense of duty and a conviction that much depended upon the faithful performance of her regular daily task. She knew little about books, for her educational opportunities had ceased at fifteen. Great movements that were going on in the big, busy, populous outside world held less attraction for her than for most women; indeed, the average American maid or matron, with visions of feminine progress, emancipation, equal suffrage and the rest of it, would have voted her a "back number," so staid and old-fashioned and thoroughly contented was she with her lot in her little home on a lonely, barren, sea-washed, rocky point. Hers was no "primrose path," strewn with pleasures. Yet she loved nature in all its moods, and the changeful panorama of sea and sky, sunshine and storm, was her constant source of inspiration and delight. She might well have been a daughter of the old Viking race, for she drew strength from the sea; but she was just a plain American woman, with daily work to do, with her big lamp to trim and keep alight at night, and to give help when and where it was needed. And so well and faithfully was that work done and that help rendered that the name of Ida Lewis, of Lime Rock Lighthouse, has gone down to fame among the immortals in our country's history. She had rescued many from death, and when she lay dying, the sympathy of the nation poured in upon her in messages of love. The great warships ceased their cannonading and dipped their colors in silent salute. Honored by Congress, and beloved by her country, her career shows what one of the good old type of American women can accomplish simply by keeping her light burning and doing her duty well. Such a life is a splendid monument to the virtues of simple courage and fidelity.

Trying Out the "New Theology"

REV. REGINALD J. CAMPBELL, the inventor of what is known as the "New Theology," whose remarkable doctrines have stirred up a big controversy in England, is visiting the United States. He will make a three months' preaching or lecturing tour under the management of Dr. Algernon S. Crapsey of Rochester, who, it will be remembered, was deposed from the Episcopal ministry several years ago after a stormy experience. He will lunch with hospitable Congregational ministers and speak in several churches. Just where Mr. Campbell stands, theologically speaking—whether on the equator or the pole—is so uncertain that there is a natural curiosity among preachers about it. If he stands squarely on the doctrines of his book, there could hardly be a doubt about his position; but he may have veered to windward considerably since he wrote it. He will get a full and a fair hearing. If the message he brings be of God and has the note of Christian truth, it will stand—and not otherwise. Fine, eloquent phrases, veiling half-truths or misinterpretations of truth, will not suffice. The "New Theology" is on trial, with its founder as its advocate. Mr. Campbell is at the cross-roads where, in plain view, he must indicate the path of his choice.

Song of the Siren

DO YOU ever get circulars of the confidential sort, inviting you to apply a part of your hard-earned savings in the purchase of shares in some scheme which the writer assures you will net you a comfortable income and put you on Easy Street? There are probably very few of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who have not received them at some time or other. We have repeatedly published warnings against listening to the allurements of the get-rich-quick schemers, whose song is almost as attractive as that of the sirens who once lured the crew of Ulysses to their fate. Our advice has now received very emphatic reinforcement from an authoritative quarter. Detective Inspector Hughes of the New York police, in an article in the World, describes the methods of the swindlers who catch their game by the use of the mails. He writes:

> The greatest asset in all these schemes is a good "sucker list." A mailing list of 5,000 names of people who will invest their money on their own judgment, without consulting their bankers or any competent person, is an invaluable asset. If a promoter can get only fifty investors he is on Easy Street. A promoter who sells worthless stock gets the name of an investor on his mailing list. He can then let some other crook have the use of the same mailing list for a consideration, and almost invariably the same "sucker," who has lost with one "get-rich-quick" man, will see a possible chance of redemption in the offer made him by "get-rich-quick" man No. 2, and will invest again. Very often, in fact, nearly always, these crooks are so sharp that the only way they can be reached is through the Federal authorities prosecuting under the postal laws. The investors themselves would not stand a chance if they had to bring suit to get their money back.

It is a good thing to keep the inspector's warning conveniently at hand for ready reference the next time you get a letter promising a "safe investment" that pays wonderful dividends. Distrust every schemer who would give you something for next to nothing. Genuine business men don't work in that way, and really meritorious propositions are not peddled through the mails.

Professor Harnack's Avowal

GERMANY'S State Church has just passed through an experience that promises to become historic. Pastor Jatho of Cologne, a minister of the orthodox State Church, was lately ejected from his place in consequence of avowed atheism. On the commission which expelled him was Professor Harnack, the distinguished theologian, who voted with his associates who were unanimous for expulsion. During the examination before the committee, Dr. Jatho, replying to questions by the president, Dr. Voigt, declared that he did not know the purport of the ordination vows to which he had pledged himself. Afterward, in an open letter to Profe[ssor] Harnack, he imputed to the latter unbelief sin[ce] to his own, and assumed that Harnack no longer [held] to the "old teaching about Christ." To this [Har]nack, in a published letter, voices a stout deni[al] heterodoxy. He writes:

> You affirm that since Christ was possessed of no supernat[ural] knowledge of God he could give us no decisive truth concer[ning] God. I have never taught this, as every one who has rea[d my] books or heard my lectures must know. . . . God has [spoken] us teachers and prophets, and over them a Man whom no[t only] but he, has made Lord and Christ. The original conceptio[n of] Jesus, which corresponds to the one I hold, is that he was [the Mes]siah and Lord. That the national church binds its teache[rs to] this pronouncement, "Jesus, our Lord," is grounded in [the] right and in the nature of things. . . . The churches [have] not only the right but the duty of holding erect the essenti[al] the Christian religion, as it has come down to us fro[m the] original form and in its historical course. Herein they are [sup]ported by all genuine historical science. . . . I have h[eld] incumbent to protect the Christian belief in God from i[ts] fication with laws of nature. Such assertions overthro[w] that the Christian possesses concerning God. There is no [ques]tion of freedom of scientific investigation involved. The [real] tial question is whether the State Church shall tolera[te] preachers those who make no difference between God an[d the] natural world.

There have been doubts concerning Harna[ck's] theology, but these his letter now sets at rest. [He] has the unqualified approval of German Protest[ant]ism, coming at a critical time when the church [is] greatly shaken by the assaults of the "libe[ral]" element. Jatho's case constituted the stron[gest] attack on orthodox Christianity that Germany [has] known in many years, and Harnack's letter, far [more] than the judgment of the tribunal itself (for he [was] trials are sadly out of place nowadays), has adm[in]istered an effective rebuke that was greatly nee[ded]

General Notes

—AS WAS GENERALLY expected, the Italians had not seen [the] most serious part of their fighting in Tripoli when they [for]mally took possession of the city. There have been a nu[mber] of sharp engagements with the Turks and some rebel A[rabs]. It is reported that most of the Arabs favor Italian rule, [and] that little further trouble is expected from them. The [most] interesting event that has recently been reported from T[ripoli] is the actual use of the aeroplane in war. Lieutenant P[iazza] using a Bleriot monoplane has been seeking out the enc[amp]ments of the Turks and Arabs in the bordering deserts [and] keeping the Italian headquarters informed of their movem[ents].

—EUGENE BURTON ELY, the aairman, the first man to a[scend] in an aeroplane on board a man-of-war, met death at the [Macon] Fair Grounds at Macon, Ga., on the afternoon of Octobe[r 1] while attempting a sensational dip. Just as the [many] spectators expected him to start upward again he was se[en to] attempt to rise from his seat, and almost immediately [the] machine struck the ground. The airman had flung hi[mself] clear of the aeroplane, but the force of his fall was too g[reat]. He died in a few minutes, regaining consciousness only [long] enough to whisper: "I lost control. I know I am going to [die]." His machine was demolished. Ely was considered one o[f the] most careful airmen in this country. His death makes the [one] hundred and first fatality since the use of aeroplanes bega[n].

The Death of a Heroine

IDA LEWIS, for nearly fifty years the keeper of the Lime Rock Light in Narragansett Bay, died on October 24 after a brief illness. Her father was keeper of the lighthouse, and at his death she succeeded him at the post and did her work with such wisdom and heroism as to attract the notice and favor of the nation. She was the Grace Darling of America. In all, during her wonderful career, she saved over forty persons from drowning. In 1858 she saved the lives of four young men from an overturned sailboat. In 1866, on a bitter cold winter day, she rowed out through the storm and saved a man drifting to ruin in an open skiff. In the autumn of 1867, in a terrific storm, she rescued two men crossing the harbor with a boatload of sheep, and then went back and saved the sheep. In 1869 she launched her lifeboat single-handed in a fierce gale and saved two soldiers who had been capsized while sailing from Newport to Fort Adams. For her singular heroism she received the thanks of the Legislature of Rhode Island and of the Congress of the United States. By a vote of Congress she was made a permanent light-keeper and was the only woman to gain that distinction. She was married many years ago to J. Wilson, but the American people will ever remember her as Ida Lewis. A few years ago she received a Carnegie medal and was granted a Carnegie pension. For more than fifty years this simple great-hearted woman lived in the lighthouse and fairly reveled in her difficult task, and now, at seventy-two years of age, she falls asleep at her post. The really great women are not the queens that wear royal robes and crowns and jewels and wield sceptres of power, nor the leaders of society with their splendid equipages and their energies exhausted in ceaseless rounds of excitement and pleasure; but the Ida Lewises who devote their lives to the lofty purpose of saving men, and who are not afraid to face death in the discharge of their duty. She is a type of the men and women in the pulpit and pew who furnish the light, who warn of moral danger, guide into the harbor, and rescue the perishing from sin and death. And these only copy the Master, who is the Light that warns from danger and rescues the shipwrecked mariners.

For the Son of man is come to save that which was lost. (Matt. 18:11.)

An Unfortunate Religious Sect

With faint and hungry men, women and children working the pumps to keep afloat their almost storm-wrecked craft, Rev. Frank W. Sandford, leader of the "Holy Ghost and Us" Society, of Shiloh, Me., brought his yacht Coronet into Portland Harbor only to be arrested in a damage suit by a woman who claimed to have been detained on the vessel against her will. The Coronet is in after a six months' trip from the west coast of Africa to within 600 miles of Greenland. About a year ago the Coronet and the Kingdom, twin missionary vessels bearing the Holy Ghosters, set sail from Chesapeake Bay for the west coast of Africa to evangelize the natives. The Kingdom was lost on the way and the thirty-three survivors were later in the year taken on board the Coronet. The craft was overcrowded, insufficiently provisioned and unsanitary. Seven of the number died of scurvy, and untold hardships were endured. On the landing of the craft some grievously afflicted by the scurvy were taken to the hospital. Rev. Frank W. Sandford, a baseball star, was graduated from Bates College and a theological school and took a pastorate in New Hampshire. Saved from shipwreck in a trip around the world, he felt called of God, he said, to special work, and founded the sect of the "Holy Ghost and Us." He induced 300 followers to build him a large tabernacle in Shiloh, Me., and secured large amounts for his naval outfit for wide missionary labor, which seems to have come to grief in the sad landing of the Coronet. There may be uprightness of character, honesty of purpose, and spiritual consecration, but practical common-sense is a necessary element in a religious leader or in a successful Christian worker. There is a large waste of religious force, and disappointment and failure, where there is enthusiasm and industry without wisdom.

For I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge. (Rom. 10:2.)

Taught Fifty-four Years

Charles F. Hartman, who had been a teacher in the public schools of New York City for fifty-four years, closed his professional duties by resignation the other day, and his friends honored his long and valuable leaders in the schoolroom with a banquet. Three hundred were present, including many prominent in the learned professions and in business life as well as those from the humbler walks. A loving cup was presented the veteran educator and appropriate addresses were made by guests and by himself. If the firmament were a blackboard and the mountains chalk there would not be room in figures to calculate the influence of these fifty-four years of service for the intellectual training and moral betterment of the young. The calling of the teacher in the public and other schools is modest, undemonstrative, undramatic, and yet it has been, it is a noble and potential factor in building up the state and the church. The high moral and religious as well as intellectual standard of the teachers of America has been one of its richest treasures and one of the prophecies of its future greatness. The mission of the teacher is so nearly divine that it is included as one of the departments of the Lord's work into which his children are called.

And God hath set some in the church, first apostles, secondarily prophets, thirdly teachers. (I. Cor. 12:28.)

Fifteen Minutes' Pause

Senator Root of New York has suggested as one of the features of the one hundredth anniversary of peace between the Anglo-Saxon races that on February 17, 1915, there be a pause of fifteen minutes, a period of inactivity and silence, in gratitude to God for the fraternity of the past, and in hope of and prayer for a continuation of the peace enjoyed. The treaty of Ghent was ratified between the United States and Great Britain on February 17, 1815. Since that time there has been no war between the English-speaking nations of the world. Earl Grey, the former Governor-General of Canada, and Hon. R. L. Borden, Prime Minister of the Dominion, favor the proposition made by Senator Root. Many proposals have been made for the celebration, including the creation of an international park, and the building of an international bridge at Niagara. Friendly relations between Great Britain and the United States have had much to do and will still have more to do in bringing about a world-peace, and the inhabitants of the earth will be able to take up the chorus:

Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men. (Luke 2:14.)

Edison and Nobel Prize

In a telegram from Stockholm it is stated that the Nobel prize for physics this year will be given to Thomas A. Edison. The Nobel prizes are five in number and are provided for by the will of Alfred Nobel, the inventor of dynamite. Each of these prizes amounts to about $50,000, and is awarded annually. The chief of the prizes provided for by the man who invented the most deadly explosive used in warfare is the one offered to the person who does the most to promote the world's peace. The will reads: "To the person who shall have exerted the greatest or the best action for the fraternity of peoples, for the suppression or diminution of permanent armies, and for the formation or spreading of Peace Congresses." The other prizes are given for invention in physics, chemistry, medicine, and letters. The prize for physics might naturally go to Mr. Edison whose inventions are the marvel of our country and the world. Few can win the Nobel prizes, or in fact many of the prizes awarded in the competition of this world, but all may win through grace divine in the contest for spiritual excellence.

I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. (Phil. 3:14.)

Greatest Thing in the World

Andrew Carnegie, on returning to America from Skibo Castle, gave an interview to a newspaper man, in which he said among other things: "I should have liked to be a reporter. I do not know of any profession in which one can better show what he is or have a better opportunity to rise. I think the most important thing in the world is the cheapest—the one-cent newspaper. It contains all the news that is flashed under the seas and over the mountains, and I told them at St. Albans that the American newspaper was the greatest thing in the world." The news of the world for a penny is a great blessing and an educator of the common people of incalculable value. Many such papers have high intellectual and moral standards, but some of them give too large proportion of space to the bad things of the world. Purity and love in journalism and literature and life are the greatest things in the world. The things that endure are the greatest, and of the things that endure love is the greatest.

And now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; but the greatest of these is love. (I. Cor. 13:13.)

Cows Work the Pump

An inventor in the West has an ingenious arrangement which compels cows to do their own pumping of water when they want to drink. The path that leads up to the watering trough terminates in a treadmill which is connected by gearing to the pump. As the trough is accessible only by way of the treadmill the animal is obliged to work the pump; fresh water to each one is assured. A valve is provided which discharges the water automatically when the animal leaves the treadmill. Animals in their wild state are compelled to secure their own food as well as water, and often a marvelous instinct is manifested. It would be a worthy benevolence if some one could invent a treadmill over which the army of lazy and trifling men who live by other people's toil might be compelled to grind their own bread and pump their own drink in obedience to the law:

In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat bread. (Gen. 3:19.)

MAKING A NATION IN AUSTRALIA

A Typical Little Village in the Australian Bush

The "Humpy" or Slab Hut of the Early Settler in Queensland

AUSTRALIA, like the United States of America, has a conglomerate population. There the representatives of many nations have found new homes for themselves, and are turning that great land of "bush" into a country of farms and vast sheep runs. The newcomers to the land have been mostly from northern Europe, and following their national tendencies have settled in the country rather than in the cities, as have the Southern European immigrants to the United States. In Australia to-day that greatest wonder of God's race-creation—the fusion of many peoples into one with the ideals and characteristics of the basic stock—is going on. This marvelous race-creation is to be seen at its best in England's great overseas dominion, where fusion is making a new Anglo-Saxon race that will fulfil its destiny by winning whole continents to the cause of the Ruler of all nations.

Owing to ill health, I was obliged to leave India for six months, and was permitted to spend four of them in Gospel work amongst the country population of Queensland, Australia's land of promise. "Go West, young man; go West!" a famous New York editor said one time, and we used to hear it in America when one was seeking a new home. "Go to Queensland!" is the advice given to young men who are looking forward to establishing a new home in Australia. There one can secure plenty of good land almost for the asking. Yet he who takes it must expect no path of roses to be his. He must serve a long apprenticeship to the changed conditions of life and seasons. He must have the spirit of the true pioneer and learn from experience and observation the secret of success which only those possess who have push, pluck and piety.

During the last forty years many landseeking immigrants have come to Queensland from Germany. Lots of these people, who came with only sturdy endurance and dogged perseverance, have now health, wealth and happiness. The homes of the first settlers were very humble, indeed, only a tent or a "humpy." As the Providence of the seasons blessed the labors of these pilgrims, they built more comfortable and pretentious homes.

Many Queensland farms and villages present the appearance of one of the riverside villages of Burma from which the water has receded, leaving the houses high and dry, but still standing on their stilts. It is due to the ravages of the white ants that these houses are built upon posts so high that one can walk under the entire building. These destructive little pests are adepts at digging into wood, and unless their havoc is closely watched they will soon destroy a house.

No matter how poor and struggling a new community may be its people soon find some way to erect a house of worship. These are quaint, plain little buildings roofed with corrugated iron and generally having a skeleton frame at the side. This frame is covered with canvas when they have picnics and tea-meetings. Visitors come from far and near, and all denominational lines and differences are lost when the liebesfest unites these wholesome people.

We were permitted to win many young souls to the Master. God blessed us richly. It was touching to see how eager these converts were in winning others to Jesus, and how interested they were especially in the salvation of the heathen children. On the morning of our departure a little boy came to us with a joyful face, and handed us an envelope containing a gold coin. On the outside he wrote "From Oliver Dart. To help to tell the heathen children of Jesus, who saved me!" God certainly loves such a cheerful little giver. With sorrow and regret we left sunny, bonnie Queensland, with health restored, and we rejoice that once again we can rturn to our work.

Mission Work Among the Shell-Diggers

DRIFTING down the rivers and swamps of Arkansas may be found a tribe of people almost unknown in any other calling. Numerous little house-boats that are to be found anchored along the banks, betray the fact that the inhabitants are busy gathering mussel shells from the river bed. Tons of shells are furnished every week to the button factories along the river, thus proving the magnitude of the industry.

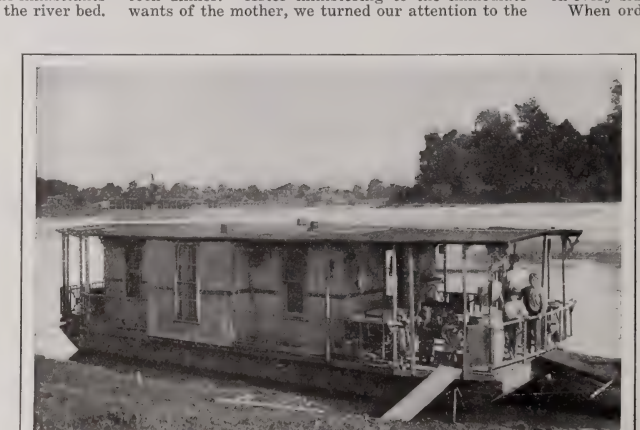
Often White River pearls, of a greater or less value, are to be found in the mussels, thus making the traffic more profitable. But the semi-annual high water, or "overflows," as they are known to the natives, make "shelling" very difficult, dangerous and often impossible. Hence, for weeks at a time, there is absolutely nothing to be made.

Accustomed as they are to the rough life of the river, yet they realize it is far from the best for the children, who must grow up without any educational or religious privileges, and the only chance they have to hear the Gospel is from good women or ministers who visit the boats.

"We ain't never hearn tell o' no sich," remarked a half-grown boy as he sat astride the gang-plank listening to the story of the Christ, as we urged a mother to train her little one for him.

In almost every instance, there are large families of children on these house-boats. Many of these little ones lose their lives through carelessness or otherwise in the waters of the river, and there are few families that have not lost one or more by drowning.

Seeing a doctor enter a house-boat day after day, we decided to investigate, and found a serious case of illness. The mother—beside whom lay a tiny blue baby a few days old—was almost unconscious. The boat was in a high state of disorder and filth; the father and the older children were trying to cook dinner. After ministering to the immediate wants of the mother, we turned our attention to the children, who were so begrimed with dirt that one must needs look twice to see if the faces had been originally of Caucasian or mulatto origin. In the afternoon, equipped with aprons, brooms, soap and soft rags, we took up again the work begun in the morning; the patient was bathed and changed, though she protested throughout. "Washin' kills I've allers hearn 'em say," whined the fever-scorched lips. The bed was changed, the windows washed, the floor swept and the piles of soiled clothes found on every side tied in bundles to be washed.



When order was restored, the patient felt better, and disinfectants had purified the atmosphere, we sat down to tell the parents of the Great Healer of the soul. The children stood around in amazement, scarcely knowing what would happen next, and when we sang a song and knelt around the sick-bed in prayer, the father broke down and wept bitterly. The eyes of the mother were full of tears, but she was too ill to comprehend the full meaning of it all.

"I know I ain't done my duty by my folks," said the father in his penitence, "and I ain't took 'em to meetin' none. That there child," pointing to a girl of six or eight years, "ain't never been out o' sight o' this boat in her life, and never heard no singing before, 'cause me nor her mammy can't neither one sing.

"I'm gwine to do better—and if God'll jest spare the old woman I'll prove it to you-uns."

Over and over the same scenes are repeated; over and over we minister to the physical and the spiritual needs, and the same promises are made as a result; but when the clouds of adversity clear away, when the high waters have gone down and the bread-winner is again able to go to "shelling," his promise is often forgotten, his duty neglected, and he falls back into the old way of living, and the children are left to grow up in ignorance and crime. Still, it is worth while, if one soul is helped by the effort.

A WORLD CONFERENCE ON OPIUM

Copyright by Clinedinst

Secretary of State Philander C. Knox

The Kursaal at The Hague, Where the Conference Will Meet

Mr. David Lloyd-George

By WALDON FAWCETT

AN International Conference has been called at the instigation of Mr. David Lloyd-George, Chancellor of the British Exchequer, and the nited States Secretary of State, to assemble at ie Hague on December 1, and will have as its ject the devising of definite ways and means for e regulation of the traffic in opium. The promise is ld out that, through the medium of this Confer- ce, the leading nations of the world will co-operate place not only the opium traffic, but that in cocaine d morphine, under the control of international law. From the earliest days of Christian missionary fort in the Orient, the workers have felt the handi- p and menace of the opium evil and have cast out for means of relief. Latterly, the ruin rought by the habit-forming drugs has spread ex- nsively to other countries, and the peril in the uation has been brought home to Americans by an ormous increase in the consumption of such drugs the United States.

The approaching meeting at the capital of the etherlands will be the outcome of the preliminary nference held at Shanghai, China, in 1909. It is anned to have the delegates assemble in the his- ric "Knights' Hall"—the Binnenhof, where the ace Conference of 1907 was held, and in which ueen Wilhelmina formally opens the sessions of e States-General. Delegates will have full thority from their governments to enter into reements relative to the regulation of the drug affic. China, Great Britain, France, Germany, aly, Japan, the Netherlands, Persia, Portugal, ussia, Siam and the United States will each be rep- sented. Austro-Hungary has declined to accept e invitation on the ground that she has no com- ercial interest in the opium trade, but has pressed a willingness to abide by any reasonable gulations that may be adopted. Bishop Charles rent of the Philippines and Dr. Hamilton Wright the Department of State, both of whom rendered icient service at the conference at Shanghai, will ain serve as the American representatives, to- ther with Mr. H. J. Finger of California. Fred. Huidekoper and Wallace J. Young of the Depart- ent of State will accompany the delegation as cretaries.

It is understood that the American delegates will ve some very important propositions to advance in connection with the framing of the proposed regulations governing the opium traffic, but the nature of these proposals will not be disclosed in advance. Our delegates support Great Britain in the effort to have similar restrictions applied to the traffic in morphine and cocaine, although the original project contemplated merely the control of the trade in opium. The effort to include the other habit-forming drugs is a later development, but one with which the American representatives are in hearty accord. There is now an annual consumption of cocaine in the United States alone of upward of 200,000 ounces, being forty times the quantity justified by legitimate medical requirements.

While the English-speaking delegates are expected to sound the keynote at The Hague, it is not forgotten that the United States took the initiative in bringing about the conference. Still, there is the fact that British interests will sustain the heaviest monetary loss in the event of the opium traffic being suppressed. This loss of revenue to Great Britain and her colonies would aggregate over $100,000,000 a year. France and Siam will also sustain a heavy financial loss, in the same event.

It is essential that Russia and Japan should co-operate to assure the success of any campaign against the opium evil—this by reason of their influence and territorial contiguity in the Orient. If current report is to be credited, there is imported from Japan to China and Korea great quantities of opium in its newest and most insidious forms. China's government has done much to eradicate the opium evil, but the good accomplished has been largely undone by the wide-spread introduction of alleged "cures" for the habit, which are simply compositions of opium and cocaine, nearly if not quite as harmful in effect as the drug they supplant. However, an outcome of the Hague conference will probably be the extension to foreign concessions in China of the pharmacy laws of the various countries; the prevention of the shipment of habit-forming drugs from one country to another and the control by each country of the sale and use of these drugs with a view to restricting them exclusively to medicinal purposes upon prescription.

The Hague might fittingly be denominated the "Capital of Conferences," so frequently, of late years, has it been chosen as the meeting place of representatives of the world powers. It is a residential and non-commercial city, and its moderate size gives it a further advantage over the more populous and bustling seats of government. Its $5,000,000 "Peace Palace," which is being erected through the generosity of Mr. Carnegie, is not yet completed, but it will be finished in a year, although two years must elapse ere it is fitted for occupancy.

China's attitude on the opium question has lately undergone a remarkable transformation. What it is to-day may be gathered from the following paragraph, taken from the Shanghai National Review:

"The astounding change that has come over the opium question during the past few months could not be better demonstrated than by the tone of the Chinese press. Two years, or less, ago the secular journal that advocated total suppression was regarded as voicing more or less unpractical and sentimental altruism, whereas at this present moment there is not a newspaper, save those in the service of the opium interest, which would dare to say that opium, as a means of sensual indulgence or pastime, is not an unmitigated curse to humanity. For this we have to thank that vast but inchoate entity known by the generic term public opinion, and this fact demonstrates in its turn that, in spite of those lower instincts that lead men to take the more facile descents towards materialism and sensualism instead of the higher roads to life and happiness, the great heart of the body politic still beats true and responds to the well-ordered appeals of right and decency. But although the campaign against the poppy has proceeded so triumphantly of late, the war against opium is not yet over. Smoking a black fluid is not the only way of 'enjoying' the seduction of the poppy, and the other ways—the morphia and cocaine ways—are all the more insidious because they can be pursued in secrecy and apparent respectability. Thus there is still plenty to be done, and we are glad to note that it is the intention of the Conference that meets at The Hague in December next to deal with the whole question of these drugs that entice men to death and dishonor."

STRUGGLING FOR AN EMPIRE IN CHINA

IN SPITE of the efforts which have been made by the Chinese Imperial Government to stem the tide of revolution which has been steadily rising in the southwestern provinces of the empire, the insurrectionists have met with continued success in their military operations. The capitals of five provinces are now in their hands and each day brings a report that in the small skirmishes which are continually taking place between them and the government troops they are usually the victors. The city of Hankow, which is one of the chief cities of importance in the affected district, has fallen into their hands. Dispatches to the British consul at Hanghai stated that the Imperial troops were first compelled to evacuate the fortifications in the city. They then took up a position at a point to which the name of Seven Mile Creek had been given. As the rebels have destroyed the telegraph lines no detailed reports of the engagement have yet come out, but the news of victory which reached Shanghai before the destruction of the telegraph lines is generally accepted as correct. It is stated that the rebels have taken up a position upon a point which commands both the railway and river entrances to the city and have so compelled the Imperial warships to retreat down stream. The crew of one of the gunboats mutinied against the few officers who were not in sympathy with the revolution, and having sunk their vessel joined the forces of the rebels ashore.

The greatest anxiety is felt among the Manchus in Peking, and many are said to have made preparations for immediate flight at the first indication of continued success of the rebellion. The two important towns of Kiukiang, in the province of Kiangsi, and Sian, the capital of Shensi, have fallen into the hands of the revolutionists. This very materially extends the territory of the uprising, and it is believed has seriously discouraged the government. Sian is the ancient imperial capital of China, and was the refuge of the Dowager Empress and her court during the Boxer uprising. It is the geographical capital and chief trading centre of five provinces, and has been considered an almost impregnable governmental stronghold.

The disaffection within governmental circles appears to be growing more serious. The viceroy of Canton has informed the authorities of Peking that he cannot depend upon the modern army which is at his command, and he has neither arms or ammunition for the older section, which he believes to be reliable. He has advised the throne to accede to the demands of the revolutionists as they have been voiced by the Assembly and grant immediately a responsible cabinet and arrange for the calling of a truly representative assembly and the establishment of modern responsible government as early as possible in the new year.

Questions and Answers

C. S., Thompson, O. I should like to know the size of the Holy Land, and how it could sustain so vast a population and the operations of such large armies as it did in ancient times.

Modern Palestine is about 130 miles in length and 70 miles wide at the south and 40 miles wide at the north. In ancient times it was much larger, and the whole land was exceedingly fertile instead of being comparatively barren and neglected as it is to-day.

C. A. P., Oneida, Wis. 1. It would no doubt please many people to have hell ruled out of Christian theology, but the fact of a state of future reward and of a state or place of punishment is so clearly set forth in Scripture that it cannot be misinterpreted. Beyond what is revealed in Scripture, all is conjecture. There are many theories on the subject, with many varied ideas as to literal and figurative interpretations; but none of these can escape the clear statement that an impassable gulf will separate the unrepentant wicked from God and from association with the redeemed. 2. God has his witnesses in every age and nation—men and women who lived purely and uprightly in his sight, and who, even if they had never heard of the Gospel, have rendered service according to the light they had. Under the old dispensation faith was accounted for righteousness.

D. A. C., Biloxi, Miss., writes, with reference to a recent paragraph in THE MAIL-BAG, which contrasted the vocations of the day school and Sunday School teacher: "While the importance and precedence of the Sunday School teacher in imbuing pupils with Christian doctrines should be readily admitted, it seems that when it comes to the associated virtues of honor, truthfulness, integrity, etc., the importance of the day school teacher equals, if not exceeds, that of the Sunday School teacher. While few schools teach set lessons in morals, it is nevertheless true that the day school teacher seizes numerous opportunities daily to teach just such virtues. They arise in the daily course of school discipline, and the teacher has the advantage of concrete cases to illustrate and force home these truths."

A. S., Washington, D. C. Please explain I. Cor. 7: 28.

There is a distinction to be made between "trouble in the flesh," which is trial and not necessarily sin, and "trouble in the spirit," which is sin. Paul meant to point out that practically all would encounter more or less trouble in their outward state, owing to the "present distress"; that is, the increasing persecution of believers, which would spread everywhere, according to prophecy. He does not refer to ordinary vexations and annoyances, such as might arise to-day, but to conditions and dangers peculiar to the trying times in which he lived. In all of Paul's writings, surrounding conditions must be kept steadily in view, or we are liable to greatly err in understanding the apostle's meaning.

I. B., Atlantic City, N. J. Your editorial in the October 18 issue, commending Governor Wilson for condemning the hymn "Beautiful Isle of Somewhere," is hardly in keeping with the spirit of your paper. This song has given pleasure to thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of children; it has interested them, and been deemed worthy of being rendered on occasions where the greatest reverence was intended to be shown. I hold that the song should not be condemned, but its merit is not half so important as Governor Wilson's heartless attack, where children were singing for his benefit. I would rather praise a less worthy song than "Beautiful Isle of Somewhere," than wound the feelings of a child.

We do not believe for a moment that the Governor's criticism, which, as we understand, was addressed to an adult audience, was calculated to wound any one's feelings, especially the feelings of children. Such a supposition is wide of the mark. His comment was directed against meaningless hymns in general, which occur altogether too frequently in the popular hymnals. There are many good people who will agree with him that a great improvement in this respect is possible. Further, he did not criticize the tune, which is doubtless beautiful, but the words, which he termed meaningless, when employed in the service of praise in a Christian church.

Mrs. E. S. H., Raton, N. M. By what authority does theology to-day accept only the spiritual duty enjoined in Mark 16: 15, and rejects the equally plain "shalls" of 17, 18, and the plain statement in verse 20 as to what followed the obedience of the apostles to all the commission?

Commentators have not laid emphasis upon the "shalls" of verses 17 and 18, because (as we explained some time ago) they are not believed to have been orginally included in Mark's Gospel, but to be an addition by other hands at a much later date. No other evangelist gives the additional statements referred to in verses 16, 17 and 18. There are many very good people, however, who do not go into these matters in the same analytical spirit, and here the real danger is zeal without knowledge (Rom. 10: 2).

J. G. B., Sergeantville, N. J. 1. There can be no forgiveness without conviction of sin, true penitence—a "godly sorrow that worketh repentance" (see II. Cor. 7: 10). Only the sick need a physician, and only those who are sin-sick realize the need of a Saviour. 2. Rev. 21: 6 implies that as they had heretofore satisfied their thirst at the stream they would now drink at the Fountain itself. John 6: 37 is interpreted by the verses immediately following. Verse 40 is comprehensive enough to reassure any doubting soul. Isaiah 55: 1 and 7 are to the same purpose, and show that salvation and forgiveness of sin are assured to all who come repentant and in the right spirit.

J. B. M., Plainfield, N. J. In the present upheaval in China, it is gratifying to have THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S assurance that our missionaries are safe. But will they remain safe? May not the revolution get beyond control? How many white missionaries are there in China at present?

While no one can confidently forecast the future, the missionary situation, at latest reports, was satisfactory, both sides having assured them of protection. It is a patriotic or reform revolution, not an anti-foreign one. The present missionary force, according to the China Mission Year-Book, is as follows: Total foreign force, 4,628, of whom 1,836 are men and 2,716 women; Chinese staff, 13,679, including 502 ordained men, 7,281 lay church workers, 1,106 Bible women, 419 hospital assistants, and 2,781 school teachers; stations having resident missionaries, 693, with 3,595 outstations; congregations, 2,717, with a baptized Christian community of 177,942, and 71,960 catechumens and a total Christian community of 287,809. We are not certain that all denominations are included in these figures.

J. T. G., South Pasadena, Calif. No new revision of the Bible is likely for many years to come and then it would only be undertaken by eminent scholars as the result of new discoveries in the ancient languages, or in connection with monuments and inscriptions not yet deciphered. The latest revision took these into account.

Mrs. D. S., Starksboro, Vt. 1. There are several instances of the kind related. S. H. Hadley was converted under such circumstances. 2. There were two Hadley brothers. 3. The story about Sam Small was never believed. 4. Never heard of it. 5. James Ambrose Cutting (1814-1867) invented the ambrotype, and L. J. M. Daguerre (1789-1851) the daguerreotype.

J. E. C., St. Louis. How can we explain II. Chron. 22: 2 and II. Kings 8: 26?

Commentators deal with these two apparently conflicting passages as to Ahaziah's age as the result of a clerical blunder on the part of a transcriber or possibly a translator. The general view upholds the passage in II. Chron. as the correct one. A transcriber could easily have confounded the Hebrew characters for 22 and 42, which are almost identical.

A. B. C., St. Pauls, N. C. Italy, once a world power, under the Roman rule, is now a leader among the second-class nations in a military and naval sense. The Italians individually are in no sense inferior to the people of other nations. Educated Italians will compare favorably with the people of any country, while the poor and illiterate classes have their counterpart in every nation under the sun. We, as Americans, should take a broad and generous view of other people. It is only the ignorant and inexperienced, who have seen little of the world, that are so narrow-minded and prejudiced as to condemn without knowledge.

Mrs. E. W., Pawtucket, R. I. Such a statement is absurd and cannot be substantiated. No one of real scholarship would risk so sweeping a charge, because he would invite prompt contradiction. We will give the subject further attention later.

U. G. W., Phillips County, Col. In our to of less than 1,000 souls, we have a Me odist, a Baptist, a Presbyterian, and Christian church. All are poor and str gling. Is there any way in which we merge our interests, work together and fulfil Christ's prayer that his children m be one?

Could not a series of union meetings planned for the Sunday evenings of this co ing winter? They might be held in the diff ent churches in turn, and served by the diff ent pastors. A union fair for the benefit some common civic or religious need, and h in some convenient building, might help bring the congregations together. There always a way of uniting on the comm ground of Christian work—charity or bene lence. If a church is temporarily pastorle let the other churches cordially invite the shepherded flock to worship with them u the want is supplied. Make them feel th all are God's children. It is not essential, ev if it were practicable, to give up your deno ination or your creed, for a creedless chu cannot long hold together.

Frederick Vollmer, Brampton, Ont., Ca writes: "I noticed in the October 11 numb of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD an article ab marine disasters, which said the warship C tain went down in 1873. It was in 1870. T Franco-German War had j begun. I was an eye-witn when the channel fleet left Sp head, and saw Captain Bo goyne, commander of the C tain, taking leave of his fam before being rowed out to ship. It was about 8 A.M. n morning that the telegram ca that she had gone down in Bay of Biscay at 2 A.M. O seventeen were saved out of 5 By chance the survivors saw boat floating which had b swept overboard. They got i Corunna, a Spanish seaport."

President Taft at the Breaking of Ground for the Panama-Pacific Exposition

ONE of the most interesting features of the celebration held in San Francisco in connection with the visit of President Taft and the breaking of ground for the coming Panama-Pacific Exposition was the parade which had been arranged and which included representatives of many of the Pacific coast industries and organizations. California seems to be the most fortunate State in the Union in the matter of outdoor music. Last Christmas Mme. Tetrazzini, the famous soprano, sang in the open air in San Francisco, and the accompanying photograph shows Mme. Nordica, one of America's native singers who has won international fame, standing with the President and Governor Johnson to review the parade.

Who Stole the Marbles?

WE have all heard strange stories of animal thieves, many of them ally beyond belief, but here is one hich is vouched for as true by Dr. ouis Banks in the Morning Star. He ays:

When I was a little boy, away over n the Oregon frontier, I had my first arbles. They were none of your big lass sort, but the plain, little, old-ashioned striped ones, with now and nen a "black alley"; but I thought ney were the prettiest things in the orld.

My father shot a weasel one day, nd tanned the weasel skin, leaving ne fur on; therefore I kept my mar-les in a weasel-skin bag, which I was ery proud of. That is, I kept them n that when I carried them around show off to the boys. But often at ight I would roll them about until ne last thing before I went to bed, nd then leave them wherever they appened to be.

Now we had just moved into our rst house, built of lumber, and fin-shed up in the ordinary way of fron-er country houses, ceiling inside and eather boarding outside.

One morning one of my marbles was one and I could not find it anywhere. he next morning two more were one, and the thing kept up until early all of the twenty or more that had had were gone. Father and nother both became interested in the natter. Who in the world could be tealing my marbles? We lived away ut in the country, and there were ust my father and mother, my little isters and myself, and yet the mar-les slipped away until all but two or hree, which I put in the weasel-skin ag and stuck under my pillow every ight, had disappeared.

While we were still wondering over I looked up one evening and saw on he inside, up under the eaves, where place had been left unfinished in eiling the house, a strange creature eering out. He seemed to have hiskers like a man. I shrank up to ny father's side and hoarsely whis-ered, "What's hat?"

He looked at it a minute, and said: Why, that is a wood at."

He had made his est down in that ole between the ceil-ng and the weather oarding, and had ome up a little too arly to prospect round. The next norning father fas-ened up the hole at he top, and, making hole lower down, ot him out and kill-d him. He was a very big wood rat, nd he had the great-st variety of things tored away in his ome, and all my lost narbles among them. What he thought he ould do with them, I don't know. Perhaps e was like a good many boys and girls we know, always anting to buy every ew thing they see, whether they really an use it or not.

Tray Was Ashamed

SIR WALTER SCOTT tells of one of his dogs that one day furiously attacked the baker, and was with great difficulty called off. But as the dog observed the baker coming every day to leave bread for the family, he began to regard him in a more favorable light, and in time the dog and the baker became great friends.

One day Sir Walter was telling somebody how the dog had attacked the baker, and as soon as he began the story the dog skulked into the corner of the room, turned his face to the wall, hung down his ears and lowered his tail and displayed every sign of being heartily ashamed of himself. But when he came to the end of the story, and said, "But Tray didn't bite the baker," the dog turned around, jumped and frisked about, and was evidently quite restored to his own good opinion.

To try the dog, Scott repeated the story in a different tone of voice, in the midst even of the conversation, but it was always the same. Directly he began, the dog crept into the corner, but when he came to "But Tray didn't bite the baker," he always capered back in triumph.

Answer to Geography Puzzle of Oct. 11

ADELAIDE and her friend Helena went shopping. They bought a green ulster and a beautiful crescent pin. Helena was dressed in a costume made of black Thibet cloth. Adelaide was dressed in green velvet and wore on her finger a pearl ring. She bought mull for a dainty dress for her sister Christiana, and then they both went home delighted with their day together.

A Cut-Out Shadow Story

IF you want to thoroughly enjoy the Boys and Girls' Department in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, write to the Aunt in the Cozy Corner, introducing yourself. There are so many good things in the Cozy Corner that never appear in the page itself, and we want our boys and girls to get the full benefit of everything that is planned for them.

All who send for it before November 15, inclosing a self-addressed and stamped envelope, will receive a very funny and delightful puppet story cut-out, with plans and directions for giving it, written by the Aunt in the Cozy Corner especially for her boys and girls.

Lovingly and faithfully

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner

The woman who loves flowers will do well to make a note of these facts:

First: House plants should be given a bath, say, once a week.

Make a weak suds of Ivory Soap and lukewarm water and, with a sponge or soft cloth, wash the leaves — both upper and under sides — of rubber plants, palms, ferns, century plants, etc.

This will open the pores in the leaves and permit the plants to breathe. They cannot breathe if the pores are clogged with dust.

Second: Once a month, (oftener, if necessary) apply with an old whisk broom, a spray or a watering can, a fairly strong solution of Ivory Soap (made by dissolving half a cake, shaved fine, in a quart of boiling water, and adding four gallons of cold water) to the stems and leaves of geraniums, carnations, etc. Rinse with clear water, half an hour later.

This will rid plants of the insect pests that constantly assail them.

Nice Verses by Our Boys and Girls

Little Bo-Peep

When it is time to go to sleep
My mama tells me of little Bo-Peep,
Of Trotty, of Goldie Locks and all the rest,
But the one I love the very best

Is the little girl who lost her sheep
Up on the mountain rough and steep.
Which she climbed every day till she lost her sheep.
I always think as I fall asleep
How happy and sad was little Bo-Peep.

"The Rain"

A little cloud one summer day
Came floating o'er the sky;
It grew and spread and in a trice
No leaf or twig was dry.

It poured and every one gazed on
As little brooks were made,
It washed the dust all off the corn,
And carefully sponged each blade.

A peal of thunder and again
The rain comes dashing down;
The old hen clucks and spreads her wings,
She's 'fraid her chicks will drown.

A rift appeared; a sunbeam stole
Right through the angry clouds,
And lo, the rain has blown away
And hidden earth's dusty shrouds.

At Grandma's

I like to visit Grandma's,
And watch her knit all day;
She always talks so pleasantly,
And sometimes she will say:

"Don't you want a cooky, dear?
So nice and sweet and brown?
And won't you have an apple,
Big and red and round?"

She lets me feed the chickens,
And wind her worsted, too;
I surely love my Grandma,
And so I think would you.

CLARENCE E. GREEN, age 11.

"The Rain"

What is it that comes and taps and taps,
Dropping, dropping till it raps
Right upon my window pane?
Could it be the gentle rain,

Bringing with it through the trees
Sweetest incense on the breeze,
Welcomed by each thirsty thing
Till the whole earth seems to sing?

Our Good-Night Verse

Truth springeth out of the earth, and righteousness hath looked down from heaven. Yea, the Lord shall give that which is good; and our land shall yield her increase.—Ps. 85.

A Little Visit to Tahiti

SO MUCH has been written about the South Sea Islands by careful and accurate observers that there remains little of general interest to describe. Indeed, one must go far from the more accessible islands to find conditions approaching those so charmingly presented by Charles Warren Stoddard and by Stevenson, and the changes that have taken place will be more likely to impress the traveler than the things which have fascinated him in those authors.

Tahiti, of the Society Islands, is one of the most important of the French possessions in the Pacific, with steamship connection to San Francisco and New Zealand. The hotel accommodations at Papeete, the principal town, and at a few other places, are comfortable and well adapted to tropical life, and in July many tourists visit the island to be present at the annual native festivities that occur in connection with the anniversary of the fall of the Bastile on the 14th of the month. At that time canoes from many of the neighboring islands come to Papeete, bringing crowds of pleasure-seekers, who, with their dances and songs, give the traveler a glimpse of the native life of former days.

The Society Islands are of volcanic origin, rising from the low bed of the ocean, which has depths near the islands of 1,500 to 2,000 fathoms, while the highest peak, in the centre of the island of Tahiti, reaches an altitude of 7,300 feet! On a clear morning the view as the ship approaches the harbor of Papeete is most beautiful, showing deep valleys penetrating from the coast to the mountain peaks of the interior.

An interesting and somewhat strenuous excursion is to follow one of the valleys upward to the centre of the island. The trail up the valley is practically the bed of the stream, for it crosses and recrosses, traversing a bit of low land, first on one side and then on the other, plunging through tunnels of dense vegetation dripping with water, so that one is quite as dry wading up the stream as pushing through the high grass and tree ferns.

Proceeding up the valley, the sides become more precipitous, until finally the trail leaves the bed of the stream and climbs up the steep wall through great tree-ferns and tangled vines, until a short distance over a ridge it reaches a pretty little lake shut in by cloud-capped peaks.

Near Papeete the beautiful Fatauua Valley may be visited in an afternoon. For a good part of the way a carriage road leads up the valley, offering changing vistas of gorgeous tropical foliage and distant mountain peaks. At the end of the road a foot-bridge leads across a lively mountain stream to an easy trail, which one ascends but a short distance to obtain a view down a narrow, steepsided valley every inch clothed in the densest verdure. At the end of an hour's climb the Fatauua Falls, 600 feet in height, are seen on the opposite side of the canyon.

Native houses with palm-leaf mats drying in the sun, to be used as thatch, are common sights. The walls are made of upright bamboos, with a half-inch space between each to allow a free passage of air into the house. Rows of mats are so arranged that they can be let down to cover the walls in case of rain, while at other times they are rolled up under the eaves. All the houses are thatched with leaves of either the cocoanut palm or pandanus. The food supply is at the door, for back of the house may be seen the serrated leaves of the bread-fruit tree. A short journey into the hills will provide several days' supply of "fei," a delicious fruit for baking, and fish may be caught upon the reef. Why, indeed, should the Tahitian toil? The great leaves of the wild "taro" grow by the roadside; the young leaves are delicious boiled, and the curious stranger will find many other new delicacies of the table—the alligator-pear, the baked papaya, the Mantis crab, the raw fish, as good as the best oyster, served with Tahitian sauce, and, on rare occasions, a salad made from the heart of the cocoanut tree.

A little pig was brought one day for dinner, and nowhere is roast pig more prized or better prepared. A fire was built in a hole in the ground, covered with stones, and, when all was ready, the pig was carefully laid in with bread-fruit leaves to roast. Here it remained for an hour or more, and certainly when it was exhumed it was perfectly cooked; and, served up with plantains, it made a most palatable dish.

A Silent Money-Maker

THE problem of raising money for the church is much like the poor—we have it ever with us—and new ideas are always of interest to good women. The members of a little church in Massachusetts worked out the following plan with great success last year: From the funds already on hand, they purchased a vacuum cleaner which could be operated by hand. They told the manufacturers that they expected to use it as a money-maker for the church, and upon the agreement to give out their circulars to patrons, the firm allowed them a liberal discount on the asking price. The cleaner then became the property of the church, and was used every week for cleaning the house of worship.

And now comes the money-making end of it! The housewives of the town could rent this wonderful vacuum cleaner for $1.50 a day, or the same amount of money they would pay a cleaning woman. And the housewives did rent it and were delighted at the chance, for help was very scarce in this little town. In less than three months, the cleaner had paid for itself, and after that every dollar and a half taken in on the renting of the cleaner was money in the coffers of the needy church.

The member who had charge of the renting had this little story to tell: "We can count on about $20 every month from that little cleaning machine, and it represents no trouble or useless expenditure of money from the members of the church. It cleans an entire house in a day with no manual labor, and to women who do their own housework it has proved a veritable godsend. We have helped the church and at the same time helped the members in a very practical way. Some women do not care to run the machine themselves, so we found it necessary to train a young boy to manage it, and if they require his services it costs them fifty cents extra; but really it is so very simple that any woman can take care of it herself."

BEE DISEASES

IT WOULD seem that every animate thing that man propagates for his own use is afflicted by its own particular kind of disease; the honey bee is no exception. The Department of Agriculture estimates that last year the loss to bee-keepers by the two diseases known as American Foul Brood and European Foul Brood amounted to at least two millions of dollars. These diseases do not affect the adult bees, but attack the larvæ in the brood combs, effectually destroying them. As the life of the colony depends on the continued production of young stingbees, and the life of the average worker is only three weeks, it follows that it must soon be depleted where the disease continues. Both the diseases named are caused by a rod-shaped bacillus, that propagates so fast that one may become the parent of millions within twenty-four hours. With care this bacillus can be stamped out, and once out the same care must be exercised to see that it does not return.

For Letters About Oatmeal

We ask letters from people giving actual examples of the good one derives from oatmeal.

The main facts about oats are quite generally known. Oats are richer in elements that feed brains, nerves and bodies than any other grain that grows.

As an energy food—a food for vim—nothing compares with oats. As a food for growing children nothing takes their place.

Yet only two-thirds of the homes in America regularly serve oatmeal. In but half of the homes is it a daily diet. So we ask you who know what oatmeal does to help us inform the rest.

For the 185 letters which best serve this purpose we offer the following prizes:

For the	5 best letters,	$100 each . .	$500.00
For the	10 next best,	50 each . .	500.00
For the	20 next best,	25 each . .	500.00
For the	50 next best,	10 each . .	500.00
For the	100 next best,	5 each . .	500.00
	185 separate prizes, totaling		$2,500.00

This contest closes December 1, 1911. Soon after that date checks will be sent to the prize winners. And all who write letters will be given the names of the prize winners.

Valuable Facts

Here are samples of facts which we regard as being of value to others.

Archdeacon Sinclair, an Englishman, says that in his family and his father's family there were twenty six-footers, all brought up on oatmeal.

The Director of Athletics in a great university states that oatmeal is the food for athletes. It has been with him a regular diet for over forty years.

The superintendent of a school for delinquent boys says that these boys, when fed largely on oatmeal, show immediate and marked improvement.

A physician of the tenements, dealing largely with children who are wan and incapable, says their greatest lack is proper nutrition. In those sections only one home in twelve is an oatmeal home.

A nerve specialist states that Avenon (an extract of oats) has proved itself one of our greatest tonics.

A superintendent in charge of 2,000 woodsmen in Maine, after consulting with experts, has adopted oatmeal as the chief food for endurance.

A teacher whose pupils rarely get oatmeal says the children lack concentration. Their usual breakfast fails to fit them for study. Two hours before noon they become entirely incapable.

Sir Critchton-Browne, a high English authority, cites experiments on animals which show how oatmeal develops the thyroid gland.

Dr. Arnold Lorand, in his book, "Old Age Deferred," shows how this gland affects one's apparent age. It is argued that proper care of these ductless glands can ward off age as much as twenty years.

What We Seek

From men and women in position to know them, we seek for other facts like these.

But we also want facts from individual experience. Many a mother has seen wondrous examples of how children thrive on oatmeal.

Many a brain-worker has learned from experience how much such workers need the phosphorus in oats. Many a muscle-worker knows how oatmeal adds to one's endurance. Many a person, when in need of more vigor, has tried a 30-day diet of oats. Doubtless many old people who still retain youth know that oatmeal has helped them do it. We ask for all these facts.

No letters or names will be published. But the facts, when important, will be carried by us to tens of millions of people. The letters most helpful to people in general will be the prize-winning letters.

Address all letters to The Quaker Oats Company, Contest Department, Chicago, Ill.

Quaker Oats

The rich, plump oats make the best oatmeal. We select them by 62 siftings. We get but ten pounds of Quaker Oats from a bushel.

These luscious oats, prepared by our process, form the most delicious oat food in existence. Yet Quaker Oats—the very utmost in oatmeal—costs but one-half cent per dish. Do you think that it pays, in this premier food, to serve an inferior grade?

France Objects to "Dear Food"

Gendarmes Selling Food in a French Market

OUR illustration (from the Illustrated London News) shows a singular feature of the general agitation against high food prices which is now prevailing in many sections of the French republic. With the idea of calming the marketing housewives, who are in revolt against "dear food," the Department of the North ordered gendarmes to assist at the selling of market produce, a plan which is claimed to have averted many violent scenes and no doubt violent acts as well. What is known as the "egg and butter strike" began several weeks ago, when housewives took so decided an attitude against high prices that it was found necessary in many places to read the Riot Act and to take stern measures to suppress violence.

A Girl Evangelist for Young People

Miss Annie Agnes Smith

FEW young evangelists have a more promising future than Miss Annie Agnes Smith, who is affiliated with the Methodist Episcopal Church of Stapleton, Staten Island, N. Y. She is a member of the Quarterly Conference, which gives her an exhorter's license and authorizes her to "do the work of an evangelist." Converted in her childhood, and possessed of a great desire to work for the Master, she was led into the work while in her girlhood. From the outset her work has been fruitful. She is an eloquent, forceful and spiritual exhorter. Her experience in Christian work is wide for one of her age. Her special field is that of a young people's evangelist. She is now engaged in conducting a series of meetings in the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Dover, N. J.

Divorce Among the Arabs

FEW Arab women I have met seem happy, writes Josephine E. Spaeth in Neglected Arabia. When one visits them at first, they often appear content; they will entertain cheerfully and are always hospitable. It is sometimes only after a series of visits, and after they are convinced of the sincerity of our friendship and love for them, that they have confidence enough to unburden their hearts. As one of them said last week, "Over us hangs a heavy sword continually, and we do not know when it will drop suddenly upon us." They live in constant fear.

The other day, during my visit in a house where I call weekly, a wife of a high-class Arab came in to make her call. After the usual formal greetings, she began an eager and fluent conversation with the hostess. Expressions of anger, scorn, mockery and laughter succeeded each other very rapidly on the faces of the women who were listening. The hostess was anxious to find out what I thought about the matter; I had to admit that I only understood part of it. She then turned to the speaker and asked her to take off her veil that I might understand her better, and to tell me her story.

"These people," said the hostess, referring to the missionaries, "always do the right thing; they are better than we are; ask her what you should do."

So she turned to me and said: "It is just this way: I am my husband's first wife. I have three sons and one daughter. The latter is married. All my children are grown up. Since my marriage my husband has married three other wives. He brought them all into our house, and I have trained them all in household duties and taught them how to sew. You see, each of them was young and knew nothing when she married. I cared for their children, and I was the head of the harem. Now, my husband is sick, and he says 'I do not care for you any more. When I am better I am going to marry another. You are divorced and will have to go.' You see our book allows a man only four wives, and if he marries another, he will have to divorce one. All his wives I have trained to do the work well; my sons are big and I am old, and, of course, I am the one he needs the least now. Do you not think it would be best if he should die? He told me to send for the doctor. I refused and told him to die."

I let her finish her long story, and then tried to give her the advice she asked by showing her the wrong attitude she was taking to gain her point, and did my best to tell her that in God's sight she was the only lawful wife, and that it was her duty to care for her husband while ill. I told her how love and devotion are expressed in time of illness in our homes. She seemed to think it impossible that this high degree of love could exist between a father and mother.

Is it true, as many claim, that these women are happy because of their ignorance? Is it true that plural wives live with each other and love each other as sisters, as others hold? All that I have seen so far and information that I have gained from other missionaries and from the women themselves, deny this idea most emphatically.

This Beautiful Seal Plush Coat $22.48

DIRECT TO YOU — All Charges Prepaid

This is a wonderfully rich and luxurious coat that has every appearance of costly sealskin. Read this description:

No. 1602.—Seal Plush Coat, 54 inches long; broad shawl collar and cuffs; lined with black or pearl gray guaranteed satin, inside pocket to match; two handsome silk cord frogs with seal plush buttons also loop and frog to fasten coat at throat. The coat is not skimped anywhere, and meets full in front.

A coat like this in natural fur would cost a fortune. These textile reproductions of natural furs have been brought to a wonderful perfection. They give you exactly the warmth, fashion and luxury of costly furs at a modest price. They wear longer than natural furs, because they do not shed hairs. They are beyond comparison with the cheap imitations that have followed the success of Texfur Garments.

In addition to this lustrous seal plush, we make coats in Caracal, Bokhara Lamb, Persian Lamb, Balkan Lamb, Nutria and Velour du Nord. These are made up in a great variety of handsome styles from imported models and are sold at prices up to $49.40. We sell direct to wearer only, saving you all dealer's profits. This enables us to give better values for your money than you have ever seen.

Send No Money

We shall be glad to send you the coat described above or any other of our many styles C. O. D. on approval, giving you the opportunity to see and try on the coat before you pay a cent. We do this because we know our coats are unrivalled in style and quality.

When you see them you'll know at once that they are far greater value for the money than any you can buy in stores.

The simplest Gown looks well on a Figure of Correct Proportion if Carried Well.

You Can Weigh Exactly what You Should Weigh

My pupils are among the most refined, intelligent women of America. They have regained health and good figures and learned how to keep well. Each has given me a few minutes a day in the privacy of her own room to following scientific, hygienic principles of health, prescribed to suit each individual's needs.

No Drugs—No Medicines

My work has grown in favor because results are quick, natural and permanent and because they are scientific and appeal to common sense.

Be well—nothing short of well.

Radiate Health—so that every one with whom you come in contact is permeated with your strong spirit, your wholesome personality—feels better in body and mind for your very presence.

Be Attractive—well groomed.

Improve Your Figure—in other words be at your best. You wield a stronger influence for good, for education, for wholesome right living, if you are attractive and well, graceful and well poised—upright in body as well as in mind—and you are happier.

I want to help every woman to realize that her health lies, to a degree, in her own hands, and that she can reach her ideal in figure and poise.

Judge what I can do for you by what I have done for others.

I think I do not exaggerate when I say I have corrected more

Chronic Ailments and built up and reduced more women during the past nine years than any physician—the best physicians are my friends—their wives and daughters are my pupils.

I have Reduced about 25,000 women from 10 to 85 lbs. I have rounded out and Increased the Weight of as many more—all this by strengthening nerves, heart, circulation, lungs and vital organs so as to regulate the assimilation of food.

Won't you join us—we will make you and the world better.

I have published a free booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly, and giving other information of vital interest to women. Write for it and I will also tell you about my work. If you are perfectly well and your figure is just what you wish, you may be able to help a dear friend—at least you will help me by your interest in this great movement of health and figure through natural means.

Sit down and write to me NOW.
Don't wait—you may forget it.

I have had a wonderful experience, and I should like to tell you about it.

Brander Cushing's Ambition

The admiral was a small man with unusually square shoulders, and a dignified bearing, which made good at least three inches which he lacked in stature. When he faced Cushing, the young man was struck at once with his mild and pleasant expression.

"Oh, yes, Pax. Of course I want to meet the young man. Do you remember, sir, a year ago when the fleet sailed for the Pacific, there was an unusual accident on one of our cruisers, the Del Monte? In swinging out from the wharf preparatory to accompanying us down the bay, one of her steel hawsers snapped and the short end of it whipped across the deck and caught a sailor who was stationed by the forward davits and flung him into the water between the cruiser and the piling. Do you recall anything like that, young man?"

Cushing blushed and stammered something that the girl did not catch.

"Excuse me," she said smiling. "But those whistles are very noisy. I could not hear what you said."

"I did not say anything in particular."

"But you did say you recalled the event," the admiral smiled, and looked more keenly at the young man.

"Do you also recall the fact that a young man who was standing on the wharf at the time jumped down into the water, and, at great risk of being crushed to death between the cruiser and the piling, rescued the sailor, who couldn't swim, holding him up until he was hauled on deck?"

"Yes, sir, I remember it."

"I'm sure you do. The sailor who couldn't swim happened to be my nephew. Did you know that, very often, sailors are not able to swim?"

"Yes, sir, I know it's often a fact."

"And is it also a fact—"

"Oh, father! Why be so slow? Let me ask Mr. Cushing a question. Mr. Cushing, were you the young man who jumped in and rescued Cousin Ed, and if so, how did you escape getting into the papers, and being thanked by the admiralty, and medaled as a hero, and generally acclaimed by everybody?"

"That is not a question."

"What is it?"

"An examination."

The girl laughed, and Sidney Cushing again looked at her as he had looked the first time. Admiral Marston looked puzzled.

"Yes. How did you happen to escape? There was a big crowd at the dock, and I made immediate inquiry. But I learned only by accident a few days ago about you."

"I'm awfully curious, too," said Miss Marston. "Tell us how you escaped."

"It might make a long story."

"Then come and see us and—tell it at leisure."

"May I?"

He asked the rear-admiral's daughter, but Admiral Marston answered.

"Yes, come in any evening next week."

"And Cousin Ed is with us then. How romantic! He has never met you. Think of being saved from drowning and never meeting the person who saved you."

"Yes," murmured Sidney. "It must be interesting. But this is not Washington. I may not be able to get to Washington next week. We are very busy over the new warship."

Again the girl laughed. "I believe father thinks Dockville is Washington. I didn't remember, either, for a minute, where we were. But can't you call before we go back—"

She stopped suddenly and her father said gravely:

"You forget, Pax, we return to Washington after the banquet. If business should call you to Washington, don't forget our invitation. We want to hear that story."

He turned with his daughter and left the platform with other naval officers, and Sidney followed with his friend Gordon, who parted from him out on the street in front of the ship-yard.

"Sorry I can't take you up town, Sid, but I promised to get these folks over to the ferry for the evening express."

"That's all right," said Cushing, good-naturedly. "I'll just run up to Main Street and join my pater there. He has promised to take me over to the naval banquet in New York to-night."

He walked fast, with the athlete's easy stride, through the maze of carts, vans, trucks, motor drays and freight wagons that jammed the river front, and entered the narrow end of Water Street.

"The pater needn't have cared about such a thing as a hat. There were half a dozen in the office that might do." But he smiled again as he recalled his father's precise military exactness of habit and his punctilious observance of all the exact etiquette belonging to dress, and also dwelt a second on the fact that in all his life he, Sidney, had never for a second questioned his father's orders or asked why he was told to do a thing. His father had told him to go and buy a new hat, and he was going to get it. That was all.

It was now three o'clock. The launching had occurred at the afternoon high tide, and there was a full hour before his father would expect him back at the ship-yard. He did not want to miss the last train out and so miss the naval banquet, and took the short cut through Water Street to Moore.

He had reached the end of Navy Lane when he was brought to a sudden stop by a tremendous concussion of sound that roared up the narrow alley he was passing, and the next instant he felt himself thrown off his balance and was flung against the building near which he was passing. The impact dazed him for a moment. Then, next, his senses cleared and he looked up. Seven stories above, in the great naval supplies factory, he saw, through the blown-out sashes and torn fragments of window casings, human heads, shoulders, arms of scores of girls and young women who were screaming madly. Next he was conscious of black smoke in round balls rolling out over the heads of the human creatures swaying up there, tearing at one another to get to the windows, appearing and disappearing. Then red and white tongues of fire shot through the black balls of smoke, and then—he stared up with death-white face as the first girl struggled out on the window-sill, seventy-five feet above the stone flagging, threw up her arms and without a second's pause jumped out into the air. Another followed. Another, another. O God! Was there no other way? "Stop! Stop! Wait!" He knew he was shouting, but it seemed as if his throat was choked with blood and ashes. He realized that buildings were emptying around him, that hundreds of people had suddenly swarmed into the court and alley and were looking with awful earnestness at the silent bodies falling, falling out of that furnace up there. And then his brain cleared and he began to seek a plan. His mind was made that way.

The alley behind the burning factory was only ten feet wide. Directly opposite the rows of shattered windows was a double-decker tenement. People were pouring out of it in streams, carrying every imaginable thing. The doorway which opened widest offered most hope. Sidney darted in and rushed up the central stairway. The clang of the fire engines sounded in his ears as he reached the top of the first landing. Still he raced on, one thought in his throbbing brain—that seventh story with its human cluster of fair-haired girls, fighting for a chance to die outside instead of inside the room where only a minute before they had been peacefully at work.

He knew, as he raced past landing after landing, that more bodies were falling, and he knew that as he ran he was crying out silently, "Wait! Wait!" But not out loud. He needed all his breath for what he wanted to do and hoped to do, but did not yet know how he could do it.

At last he had reached the seventh story and flung himself into what he thought was an empty room on the side opposite the terrible row of windows only ten feet away. Even as he entered the room he cast a look around with swift encircling gaze.

Over in a dark corner a human being sat upon a curiously contrived couch, staring at him.

"What is the matter? What is the trouble? What do you want?"

"A board! Something long enough to reach over—"

"A board?" The figure still sat there. But the voice was energetic. "They were papering the next room this morning." One hand pointed backwards.

Sidney flung himself out into the hall. Dim figures of crying people passed him. He threw himself against a door. He burst it in. Thank God! The paper-hanger had left his stuff there. The board! He seized it, rushed back and thrust it through the window to the window opposite. Was it long enough? He hardly waited to see. The strange figure on the couch seemed to watch him.

The board just reached, and that was all. A few inches only to rest on the edge of the sill. A few inches only to make all the difference between living and dying.

He dared not trust his weight on this frail bit of bending wood, but he saw in an instant that he must put something on the end of it to prevent it from slipping off the precarious edge of the window sill. He tore out the lower window sash with almost one movement, jammed the end of the board hard up against the side of the casing, and then mounting on the sill himself he braced his feet against the board, and holding on to the edge of the upper window sash with one hand flung himself out as far as he could with arm extended to help the first one who might venture across that narrow and doubtful means of life.

Three walked over the swaying passage and another slipped and fell just as his hand was about to clutch her arm. Then through the swirling smoke he felt conscious of one face back in the opposite window, and he knew that the person was helping others up and encouraging them to go first. He called to her across the ten feet of eternity:

"Push your end of the board there! It is slipping off here!"

He could feel the end of the board under his foot moving, and he knew in a moment that she had obeyed him intelligently and instantly.

"Strong, brave girl!" he said to himself, and then he witnessed as wonderful a sight as he had ever seen. But then, he was young yet, only twenty-four, and he had much to see.

Two girls were standing on the board at the opposite window. Their faces were blackened and fire shreds clung to their dresses. And lo, as he looked, and leaned far out with extended arm, he saw that the first girl was a cripple, and the other, who had already helped the others, was behind her, creeping along, holding the cripple and pushing and balancing her across those few feet of life.

"Quick!" he shouted. "The board is slipping!"

It was a thing to dream of in the years to come. He stood there, his whole figure dilated, his arm flung out with fingers agonizing to reach that human creature shuffling so slowly toward him. At last he clutched her dress. Even as he did so he knew he was thinking of the other. The board could not possibly hold the two. He pulled her in through the window and she fell in a fainting heap on the floor. The other? She was just beyond his reach. He strained every muscle to reach her; caught her hand; with a last desperate pull swung her towards him, and felt the board go and the window sash above him give way.

Even then, he whirled as he fell, and the girl, who had with that last effort of his plunged through the window, turned and made a frantic clutch at him.

He was hanging, by some miracle, with his hands grasping the rough bricks of the window ledge, looking up into a face blacked with smoke and blistered with fire. She had her two hands about his wrist and her lips were moving as if in a prayer. He thought even then of the incident, not more than two hours ago, when he had hung to that chain, and what he had risked it all for.

Then he felt her grasp relax and she fell back into the room.

"Brave lass! She's fainted," he said. He struggled to raise himself and felt his strength going, when a fireman's head appeared at the window.

"Here!" was all the man said. He grasped his wrists in an iron clutch. Sidney plunged up, using feet and knees and elbows.

"That was a close call for you, young feiler!"

And then the room seemed to swarm with firemen, and he had for the next few moments a confused medley in his mind of shouts, of hoarse orders, of fire-hose dragged in at windows, of overturning furniture, of all the wild but systematic movements of a city fire brigade in action. The double-decker was on fire, and the company was at work from within its walls, from the alley below and from the roof.

Sidney never again saw the fireman who had pulled him up to life. Not even all his inquiries in the after days could discover him. One of the nameless heroes of a commercial age, to whom heroism is a part of daily action, as little thought of as going to work in the morning or coming home again at night. He passed on with the great unnumbered army of common men who are always doing their duty, and don't want any medals pinned on them for doing it.

In the thick of all the confusion he had a distinct sense of more to be done. He had almost lost consciousness. But he found himself again near the window. Nothing but smoke and flame. That was all a thing of the past. No more lives to be saved there. Where had they all—

Then he knew he was over in the corner where the strange figure of the man was. The girl was there, and the crippled girl, and they were all three carrying the man out. Smoke and flame in the narrow hallway. More shouting, mad rushes for stairways, water, fire, smoke, firemen, tenement roomers in panic, and at last, thank God, out in the street, the man on the couch, strangely calm, the girl with the blackened, burned face, and always in Sidney's vision as she steadied her end of the burden. And the cripple somehow keeping alongside, shuffling down the narrow stairs, now flung against the wall by desperate men and women, now almost trodden under foot as the people poured down like maddened cattle. And then, as they finally reached the street and kindly eager hands helped, Sidney had the final view of the girl falling on her knees over the form on the couch, while the man's hands fell with searching pathos over her tangled black hair. And for the first time Sidney realized that the man was blind as well as paralyzed.

Then he knew the couch, with the man and the girl by its side, and the crippled girl, had all been moved back,

"Little Envelopes of Dress Magic"

So Diamond Dyes are termed by a Practical Western Woman

"When I first heard of the wonders of Diamond Dyes, it amused me. Finally, I tried them—and became more widely enthusiastic than anybody. So well have they solved my problems of dress that Diamond Dyes are to me 'little envelopes of dress magic.'

Mrs. A. L. Walker, Kansas City, Mo."

The woman who doesn't know Diamond Dyes has no idea of the possibilities of her present wardrobe. And nothing is simpler than finding out through one trial of

Diamond Dyes

There are two kinds of Diamond Dyes—one for Wool or Silk, the other for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods. Diamond Dyes for Wool or Silk now come in Blue envelopes. And, as heretofore, those for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods are in White envelopes.

Here's the Truth About Dyes for Home Use

Our experience of over thirty years has proven that no one dye will successfully color every fabric.

There are two classes of fabrics—animal fibre fabrics, and vegetable fibre fabrics:

Wool and Silk are animal fibre fabrics. Cotton and Linen are vegetable fibre fabrics. "Union" or "Mixed" goods are 60% to 80% Cotton—so must be treated as vegetable fibre fabrics.

Vegetable fibres require one class of dye and animal fibres another and radically different class of dye. As proof—we call attention to the fact that manufacturers of woolen goods use one class of dye, while manufacturers of cotton goods use an entirely different class of dye.

For these reasons we manufacture one class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Cotton, Linen or Mixed Goods, and another class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Wool or Silk, so that you may obtain the very best results on EVERY fabric.

Remember: To get the best possible results in coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods.

AND REMEMBR: To get the best possible results in coloring Wool or Silk, use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Wool or Silk.

Diamond Dyes are sold at the uniform price of 10c per package.

Valuable Books and Samples Free

Send us your dealer's name and address—tell us whether or not he sells Diamond Dyes. We will then send you that famous book of helps, the Diamond Dye Annual, a copy of the Direction Book, and 36 samples of Dyed Cloth—Free.

OUR COMFORT CORNER

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

Is This Foolish?

THE only money I spend foolishly," said a little woman the other day, "is what I manage to spare for reading matter. I subscribe to my favorite papers and magazines, and I do this year in and year out because they bring me good cheer from the big world that I never see. I do without many things that most people think are necessary, such as new clothes and furbelows and bright ribbons, but as I have not many neighbors and do all my own work I must keep in touch with what is going on. One of my friends asked me how I could be interested in stories that were only made up and had never really happened. I looked at her and saw she was literal and had no imagination, and I did not try to answer her. Whether it is foolish or not I shall continue to save up and subscribe for the papers that bring me sunshine."

If people in general could be as wise as this dear lady, homes would be uplifted, children gain in intelligence and life be better worth living. Money spent for good literature is an investment that pays well in the end. It is not foolish to invite to your door fifty-two weeks in the year a cheery, up-to-date, charming and versatile visitor who brings to your table a perfect feast of pleasant things, who gives you glimpses of the world beyond the sea and very often says the word that you have been waiting for.

Life for the woman who does all her own work is largely ordered according to routine. She rises early in the morning and prepares breakfast; the children are to be washed and dressed and sent to school; the good man of the house is to be started for the day in a happy mood, and when husband and children are out of the house, sweeping, dusting, washing, ironing, cooking, sewing and mending go on in the same round, from Monday's rub in the washtub to Saturday's baking of bread and cake for Sunday. When there are neighbors to run in and make an agreeable break, the day loses part of its monotony, but where neighbors are few and their calls are far between, a book or magazine or a weekly periodical produce the effect of a combined call from the minister, the doctor, the editor, the famous artist and the author most dearly loved, not so much appearing one by one as entering informally, chatting beside the fire, and making you feel as if you were the hostess at an afternoon tea. Money spent for good reading is a splendid investment for the whole family, and does a great deal to preserve health, youth and beauty in the wife and mother.

Concerning Doubting Thomas

ALL the way down the centuries of the Christian era there has clung to the name of one of the twelve apostles who were the chief friends of our Lord while he tarried on earth, the epithet "doubting," in itself an accusation. Because Thomas, not unlike thousands who have lived in later days, found himself unable at once to grasp the amazing reality of the Lord's resurrection, he has been stigmatized almost as if unworthy to belong in the apostolic group. Yet our Lord had no disapproval for him, but instead and at once offered him proofs that it was himself and no other who had returned, as he had promised, to the circle of those who loved him. "Reach hither thy finger and behold my hands, and thrust it into my side, and be not faithless, but believing," were the words with which Jesus addressed this loyal disciple. Then he said, "Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed. Blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed." As bell sometimes answers bell, there is a verse in one of the epistles, and the writer is Peter, in which there occur the words, "Whom having not seen we love." Our love goes forth to Jesus, and although we have not seen him with our actual eyes, we have seen him with eyes of the spirit, and there are days of clear vision when we can adopt for ourselves a sweet hymn sung by the Plymouth Brethren:

So near, so very near to God,
Nearer I cannot be,
For in the person of His Son
I am as near as He.

So dear, so very dear to God,
Dearer I cannot be,
For the love wherewith He loves His Son
Is the love He gives to me.

Have we wandered away from Thomas called Didymus? Suppose we turn to the day when Jesus and his disciples were lingering in Galilee, and it was almost time for the great annual Passover to take place at Jerusalem. A messenger came with tidings from a little home in Bethany. In that home dwelt three friends of Jesus, two sisters and a brother. It was a hospitable home where he had often been entertained. There was no doubt in their hearts as to the fact that he was stronger and greater and more divine than any one they had ever seen. Martha and Mary and Lazarus were the dear friends of Jesus, and so when Lazarus was very ill they turned to him hopefully and confidently. If he would but come to them and come soon, the brother would recover. He did not go immediately after receiving the summons, and when he did announce his intention to return to Jerusalem, the disciples remonstrated. "Why, Master," they said, "when you were there the Jews tried their best to slay you; they would have killed you with stones; they are just as angry now. To go there is to rush into the lion's mouth. Why venture there again?" It was when Jesus declared that notwithstanding the wrath of the Jews and their animosity, he would go straight into peril, perhaps to certain death, that Thomas said, looking around on the twelve, "Let us also go, that we may die with him." This was love's final and emphatic testimonial, love's masterpiece of loyalty. Not doubting Thomas, but loyal Thomas should be haloed in history.

The Psychological Moment

CERTAIN phrases gradually slip into common usage, and are often on our lips in conversation while, if we were suddenly asked what they meant, we would be at a loss for a reply. What, for example, do we mean when we use the expression at the top of this paragraph? What is a psychological moment? Is it not a moment of vivid impressiveness, a critical moment and a moment on which destiny may hang? In a book by Arnold Bennett, Hilda Lesswayes, the psychological moment was reached when, obeying an impulse, a young girl, who up to this hour had been sheltered from every rough wind, walked through an open door up a flight of stairs and knocked at a closed door on which was the name of a lawyer. The psychological moment for this young

As Easy as an Old Shoe

E USED often to hear the expression, "As easy as an old shoe," days when it meant more than it s at present. People formerly had notion that a new shoe must fit the t so tightly that an uncomfortable aking-in process must be under-e before the shoe could be worn hout torture. Thousands of little ls had their feet deliberately de-med by their mothers because of the evalent impression that a small foot s desirable, and a large one some-ng for which to blush. For cenies the Chinese bound the feet of ir women, and people in other lands filed at the absurdity of the ancient shion. Yet, here at home, other-e sensible persons forced their t into shoes that were too short and narrow. The result for the vic-of this stupidity was suffering
m bunions, corns and in-growing
ils. At this hour, the young girl o wishes to be smart and trim from ad to foot prefers for herself a shoe slipper with a heel too high for com-t and a pointed toe. The majority ve by this time arrived at the conclusion that a shoe should fit the foot, require no breaking-in process, and be so perfect in form and fit that no pedestrian need fear the breaking down of the beautiful arch of the foot, no matter how long and hard the day's march may be. Those who have the care of little children ought from their first wearing of shoes to see that nature has her innings, and is not outraged. Our Southern friends claim that there is great advantage for children in going bare-footed during the first dozen years of life. The resident physician in a finely endowed orphanage in Virginia declared not long ago that the children in the institution were immune from influenza, croup, tonsilitis and colds in general, because summer and winter their feet were bare. After the age of twelve, when they began to wear shoes and stockings, they were more liable to take cold than they had formerly been. The naked feet, neither cramped nor deformed by shoes, were permitted to grow as nature meant them to be, and were free from enlarged joints and painful excrescences.

A great deal of physical comfort is insured by changing outdoor shoes for indoor ones, in the house. The habit once established will recommend itself to every one, to the mother whose tired head needs rest and whose nerves are disturbed by the sound of heavy boots in the halls and stairs, to the young people who may as readily attend to this part of the toilet as to that of washing faces and hands, and to the person who, having been standing or walking for hours, is greatly eased by a cool, thin, and possibly old shoe. Our English cousins, who walk more than we do, never wear the same footgear indoors and out.

"As easy as an old shoe" may have a secondary reference to temperament and disposition. There are happy, care-free people who meet each new day with a smile of welcome, who do not know what it means to be fretful and complaining, and who take the day's work with cheerful courage. It is pleasant to live under the same roof with them, and they contrast agreeably with other good people who are what may be termed difficult.

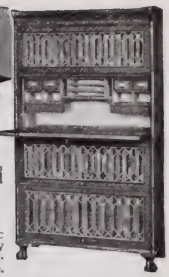
Your Uppermost Thought



UNCONSCIOUSLY you and I and everybody must reveal our uppermost thought in our intercourse with the family at home and our friends abroad. Our thoughts are not always on dress parade. When we are in formal company or among strangers we are careful what we say and how we look. When we are alone with our mirror, the uppermost thought stares back at us from the face in the glass. If it is a brave and noble thought, the writing is in the countenance we see, and if it is a mean, uncharitable thought it shows itself in the drooping of the mouth and the narrowing of the eyes. Day by day the thoughts that come to the surface mould our faces, and make us attractive or repellant.

More Than One Pays For

THE passenger in a railway train pays for a single seat. If he or she selects with care one of the best seats in the car and then ostentatiously piles in the adjoining seat, which somebody else may presently need, a lot of bundles and parcels, after which the passenger gives entire attention to the outside scenery or a newspaper, the action is indefensible. In a sparsely filled car no objection can be made to this occupation of an extra seat, but in the rush hours and when seats are wanted for people who have paid for them and still are standing, the act is both boorish and dishonest. Whoever coolly appropriates more than is paid for is second cousin to a thief.

Journeying and Praying*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

ALMOST interesting caravan has formed in the vicinity of Babylon by the river side at Ahava (Rawlinson suggests that it is the modern Hit on the Euphrates River). Ezra, the noted Jewish priest and scholar, is the leader of the caravan. Seventeen hundred people have rallied to his standard. A journey of nearly a thousand miles is before them, from Babylon to Jerusalem. It was a dangerous way across the Syrian Desert, which was infested with robbers. We notice the absence of a military escort, and wonder at the omission; for beside personal property there is treasure of gold and silver to be carried, amounting to between four and five millions of dollars. The caravan has rested at Ahava for three days at the command of Ezra. Ezra's first review of the caravan was not satisfactory, because he found there no Levites, or religious teachers. They were necessary, because the expedition was for the purpose of instructing in God's law the dwellers in Jerusalem; so Ezra halted the caravan while he sent to Babylon for teachers. About fifty priests and Levites came, bringing with them two hundred and twenty Nethinim. The days of waiting at Ahava were days of fasting and prayer that God would be their shield and defense all along their dangerous journey. Artaxerxes, the king, would have given them a band of soldiers, but Ezra said, "I was ashamed to ask of the king a band of soldiers and horsemen to help against the enemy in the way, because we had spoken unto the king saying, 'The hand of our God is upon all them that seek him for good, but his power and his wrath is against all them that forsake him."

Trust and Effort

But in the spirit of "Trust in God and keep your powder dry," Ezra for safety divided the gold and silver into twelve portions, and delivered it into the keeping of twelve of the chief priests, telling them to account for it when they should reach Jerusalem. Even while men are trusting God, God wants them to do all they can to help themselves. That is why he gives men both strength and wisdom.

Packed among the treasures of Ezra were the "rolls." The rolls which Ezra had, contained the law of God, and he had planned the expedition to Jerusalem for the purpose of teaching the people about God's laws and how to worship him in the great temple they had built to the honor of his name.

The day of starting came, and on and on they went for four months, from March to July, when they arrived safely in Jerusalem. Ezra was a kind and wise leader, for he told the twelve priests to rest three days before they should deliver the silver and the gold which he had put into their keeping. Then it was weighed, and not an ounce was missing. It is most interesting for us to be told in Ezra, chapter seven, just how this amount of treasure was gathered together. Strange as it may seem, it was gathered by a decree of the king, "a heathen king" we would say, at least he was not a worshipper of the living God, but he seemed desirous that his Hebrew captive subjects should be true to their God, and there was evidently a feeling on his part that he might thus propitiate God, and make his own kingdom safer; for said he: "Let it be done exactly for the house of the God of heaven, for why should there be wrath against the realm of the king and his sons?" (Ezra 7:23.)

* The International Sunday School Lesson for November 19, 1911. Ezra's Journey to Jerusalem. Ezra 8:15, 36. GOLDEN TEXT: "The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek him. Ezra 8:22.

The Caravan of Life

How vast is the caravan of souls thus passing along the journey of life! We see it is divided into two parts; one carries the banner, "In God we trust;" the other, "We can take care of ourselves."

In the first section, the faces are peaceful. Often we hear the sounds of song and of prayer, and there is sweet converse one with another, and incidents are given to illustrate the loving providence of God. One said: "A little boy asked his mother to let him lead his little sister out on the green grass. She had just begun to run alone, and could not step over anything that lay in the way. His mother told him he might lead out the little girl, but charged him not to let her fall. I found them at play, very happy, in the field. I said, 'You seem very happy, George. Is this your sister?' 'Yes, sir.' 'Can she walk alone?' 'Yes, sir, on smooth ground.' 'And how did she get over these stones, which lie between us and the house?' 'Oh, sir, mother charged me to be careful that she did not fall, and so I put my hands under her arms, and lifted her up when she came to a stone, so that she need not hit her little foot against it.' 'That is right, George, and I want to tell you one thing. You now see how to understand that beautiful text, "He shall give his angels charge concerning thee, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone." God charges his angels to lead and lift good people over difficulties, just as you have lifted little Annie over these stones. Do you understand it now?' 'Oh, yes, sir; and I shall never forget it while I live.'"

Then another story was told by one who was journeying under the banner of Trust: "Some years ago there was a poor child left alone at the death of his parents in a distant island of the ocean. His father and mother were killed in a cruel war. Now see how God takes care of his creatures. The boy was very sad and wept much because he was an orphan. An impulse came to him from God, we cannot doubt, to leave the island and go to America. There he found kind friends who taught him to read and write, and who took great pains to teach him about God and about Jesus Christ. He became a true Christian. He wanted to go back to his island to tell his people about Jesus, but just as he had received his education and was ready to go, he was taken sick and died. His name was Henry Obookiah. By means of his life and death, good men became interested in his countrymen, and missionaries were sent there, churches were built, the Bible was translated, and thousands were taught to read it and learn about God. The people destroyed their foolish idols, and they became a Christian nation."

Though we fail indeed,
You, I, a score of such weak workers, He Fails never. If he cannot work by us
He will work over us.
ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

Great is the treasure carried by those who are in the Trust section of life's caravan, for they carry with them the unsearchable riches of Christ. Hear the prayer of Christ for all who bear this treasure: "Holy Father, keep them in thy name. . . . While I was with them, I kept them in thy name, which thou hast given me, and I guarded them. . . . But now I come to thee. . . . I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that thou shouldst keep them from the evil one. . . . Sanctify them in the truth." (John 17: 11-17.)

We will glance across at the caravan

Changsha's Anti-Foreign Riots

IN a letter from Rev. S. W. Elliott, a missionary of the American Bible Society in Chengtu, China, some graphic details are given of the recent anti-foreign disturbances in Szechuen Province. He writes:

"I was in Changsha when the excitement was highest. On Sunday, May 14, a tremendous protest meeting was held. It was estimated that ten thousand people assembled, with the Provisional Assembly, on the grounds of the new Educational Building, and fiery speeches were made in which foreigners were branded as thieves and robbers. On the following day tracts embodying the gist of these speeches were openly distributed in the streets by men in long gowns, and a notice was posted on the gates of the Educational Building of a meeting for the following Thursday, at which a plan of action would be mapped out, and admittance was to be by ticket.

"This is what moved foreigners to send the women and children away, as the threat was made in the tracts that they would go on a strike and close up everything in Changsha in defiance of Peking, in case the government ignored their protest against the foreign loan. The tracts did not seem to arouse the people very much, especially when patrols of armed squads of soldiers were passing up and down the streets continually day and night. The camps of soldiers which had been removed from the doors of all the mission residences at last Chinese New Year time were hastily put back.

"I walked all through the city alone with one of the colporteurs on the day following the distribution of the anti-foreign literature and visited all the missionary stations. The people showed me only respect and accepted our Christian literature courteously. When, however, I went through the same streets three weeks later, with an American and a British gunboat in port, the attitude of the people had changed so much that I was cursed and scoffed and laughed at on all sides.

"The colporteurs in the Changsha region report great difficulty attending their efforts to sell the Scriptures. They are finding the students their worst opponents. They charge them with being responsible for the foreign missionaries being in Hunan. 'If you and all the other people would only stay away and leave the foreign missionaries alone they would not stay here. They would have no material to work on. Their occupation would be gone and they would be forced to go home. You are worse enemies of China than the foreigners are.' So they report the taunts that are flung at them by the so-called patriots. It is not surprising that a number of the colporteurs have given up the work. They are certainly on the firing line in this region just now. They either develop into vigorous Christian workers or else have to drop out of the line."

carrying the banner, "We trust in ourselves." They are not marching in an orderly manner; their ranks are broken and irregular, and not infrequently we see some fall by the wayside. As we look at them we are reminded of a story we recently read of a man and wife who were on their way to Alaska in a large covered wagon. Meeting a miner, they made inquiries about the way. "You'd better not go on," said he, "the bottom's all out of the trail." "We'll take the risk," they said as they continued along through the slush. The miner stood watching them, and in less than ten minutes he saw the ice give way under them, and they were precipitated into a lake. He heard their drowning cries for help, but he could give them none.

"We'll take the risk," is the password one hears all through life among those who think they can get on without God in the world. A little boy refused to say his morning prayers on the ground that "any boy could take care of himself in the daytime if God would take care of him at night."

Let none lose sight of the treasure, more precious than gold and silver, which God has intrusted to their keeping, for an account of it will be required some day, at the end of the journey, which is the end of life, in that temple not made with hands, which is eternal in the heavens. Let no one deceive himself by saying "If I choose to take care of myself, I will set aside my responsibility to God." Not so, for the riches which are in Christ have already been paid for in the coin of his own blood. We must all render an individual account.

The Hand of Blessing

As we read the Golden Text: "The hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek him," we seem to feel the gentle touch of love resting upon us. We can not forget it if we would. We would not forget it if we could.

In the nine heavens are eight Paradises.
Where is the ninth one? In the human breast.
Only the blessed dwell in the Paradises,
But blessedness dwells in the human breast.
Given to thee are those eight Paradises
When thou the ninth one hast within thy breast.

A Faithful Pastor Dead

DR. JOHN J. REED, of New York Conference, preached Sunday morning (October 22) at Leonia, N. J., where he had resided since his superannuation last April. His text was: "As thy days so shall thy strength be." At night he attended the service, and a little later, as he sat in his parlor conversing with his family, he suddenly expired, passing as he would have wished, after a day of active and delightful service. Dr. Reed was born in New York City seventy-one years ago, graduated at Wesleyan University in 1864, was a member of Newark M. E. Conference, 1870-1881; New York Conference, 1881-1884; Cincinnati Conference, 1884-1889; New York Conference, 1889. Among his pastorates were Montclair, N. J.; Washington Square, New York; Saint Paul's and Walnut Hills, Cincinnati; Trinity Church, Newburgh, and First and Central Churches, Yonkers. His last charge was Brewster, N Y. Mrs. Reed survives, with two sons and four daughters. Funeral services were held at Leonia. Dr. Reed was one of the best-known ministers in the East, and those who knew him best were most captivated by his personality. He was a strong preacher, a poet of considerable talent and above all a Christian gentleman. His friendships were very numerous.—New York Christian Advocate.

LIFE

BEHOLD us toiling up a mountain side,
Its summit we attain;
Then with increasing impetus descend,
And breathless reach the plain.

And so the steeps of life are slowly passed,
Until, its zenith won,
Adown its slopes we glide—its years like trees
Flit by—and life is done.

AS TO RAILROAD BONDS

THERE is really no mystery in determining the safety of any regular and legitimate form of investment, and this applies particularly to railroad bonds, about which the laws of every State compel a published statement. These annual railroad reports may be had by every investor for the asking, and the man who through his own efforts has saved up enough money to invest can judge of the safety of a railroad's bonds by studying the rate per mile at which the bond is issued and comparing it with the total market value of the property per mile. The total market value of a railroad per mile can be readily ascertained by adding the market value of the stock per mile to the value of the bonded debt per mile.

Of course all railroads would not be warranted in issuing the same amount of bonds per mile, for the cost of right of way and construction and equipment are seldom the same in any two cases, and it is to meet these requirements that bonds are sold. The average bond issue for all the railroads in the United States is $67,936 per mile. The bonds representing this indebtedness are rarely of one issue or of one class. There are usually first and second mortgage bonds, and these bear the same relation to the fixed property of the railroad company that first and second mortgages do to private real estate. It follows that second mortgage bonds may be quite secure, but this can only be said after the safety of the first bonds is assured, and there is still property enough available to meet the second obligations.

While first mortgage bonds are necessarily to be preferred, the security of the second may be equally safe, provided always that the prior liens are not too heavy. In the event of a failure to meet interest, the junior bondholders, in order to save themselves, have at times been forced to foreclose. In such an event the junior bondholders are, or should be, in a position to buy all the first bonds at par when the property passes into their hands.

Other Points to Consider

The student, whom we have referred to the railroad reports, and the wouldbe investor in railroad bonds, should, in addition to the foregoing, carefully look into the gross earnings and the net earnings per mile. The gross earnings of different roads with equal facilities and opportunities for business should be compared, as well as the chances for a continuance of these conditions, or for their increase, or even for their decline. In this connection a study of the country through which the road passes will be of help, for if the population is increasing by the coming in of people from outside, or by the establishment of new branches of industry, both of which mean increased passenger and freight earnings, the railroad's solvency becomes more and more assured.

Now, the gross earnings of a railroad may be great and full of promise to the unwary, but of far greater importance to the investor is the amount of the net earnings. Under normal conditions the operating expenses of a railroad take about sixty-five per cent. of the gross earnings; but even if the operating expenses are less, it does not always mean greater care and economy in the management, but rather that the physical efficiency of the property is not kept up to a high working standard. The net income of all the railroads in the country is estimated at $4,702 per mile, though some of the more prosperous lines reported, last year, $12,000 a mile, the lowest being $1,500.

When a railroad is earning three times the amount of its fixed charges—interest, rentals, and taxes—its bonds may be considered trebly protected, and there will be a surplus for stock dividends that must prove fortunate for holders who secured them at low figures.

According to the last report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the main lines of New York, Pennsylvania and Illinois, as well as the Great Northern and the Union Pacific, are worth nearly fifty per cent. more than their total bonded debt, so that about one-half the present value of the entire properties could be destroyed without seriously impairing the value of the securities.

Comparative Values

Railroad bonds yield all the way from three and three-fourths to nine per cent., the general average being from four to six per cent. As an investment railroad bonds yield more than those of the Government, State or municipality, and less than public-utility or industrial bonds. They have equal security with the best real estate mortgages, but the average returns are not so great.

Convertibility is the distinguishing feature of good railroad bonds, as they are available at the banks as security, and are easily disposed of in the open market. It is not necessary here to discuss the stability of the market value of bonds, for, as we have already hinted, this is altogether dependent upon business conditions. We are endeavoring to show that the ideal investment should combine security of principal and interest, a fair return, ready exchange for cash, and the prospect of increased value. With this understanding, it is not unreasonable to claim that good railroad bonds meet all the requirements, provided always that they are purchased under favorable market conditions.

Railroad equipment bonds are of the nature of a chattel mortgage. They are issued to secure funds for the purchase of rolling stock, that is, cars and locomotives. These securities are known as "car trust certificates," "equipment bonds," or "equipment notes." These bonds are a first and so a direct lien upon the entire equipment purchased. If the interest is not paid and there is a foreclosure, every mortgaged wheel will cease to roll unless by the consent of a receiver. Under no circumstances can the general mortgages of the railroad attach as a first lien on the equipment until the last equipment bond is paid.

These bonds are usually for $1,000. They run, as a rule, for ten years, and are paid off in annual or semi-annual instalments. In this way, the security, ample at the beginning, grows stronger with each payment on the loan. As the equipment of a railroad is absolutely essential to its operation, it follows that every condition of the loan made for its purchase must be promptly met.

Net Returns Higher

As a rule, the net returns of equipment bonds are relatively higher, from one-half to three-fourths per cent., than those from regular bonds. This is attributed to the fact of their not being known or understood by the average investor, while they have always been in high favor with the best banks.

Equipment bonds vary as to convertibility, though when the financial market is unflurried there is never any trouble in disposing of them without loss. So, too, equipment bonds vary as to stability of market price, although they are relatively stable compared with many other classes of gilt-edged securities.

As an investment for the surplus business earnings, hinted at in a former article, equipment bonds meet all the requirements. The only objection to these bonds, an objection that the business man will not regard as serious, is the short time they have to run, and the trouble of reinvestment after the bonds are called in.

AUTUMN LEAVES

AUTUMN days have come again,
With wealth of beauty crowned.
Autumn mists o'er hill and plain
The distant scenes surround.
But every wooded mountain,
Aflame with autumn fires,
Becomes a living fountain
Of beauty that inspires.

For all the leaves that linger
Are filled with colors rare
By nature's fiery finger,
And grace beyond compare.
Soon shall fade and pass away
Their glory now possessed.
They die slowly day by day,
Then flutter down to rest.

Human life is like the leaf;
The years creep on apace,
Bound within a golden sheaf,
The Father's grain-field's grace.
May this lesson from the page
Which tells of life's brief story
Help us to enthrone old age,
Crowned with golden glory.

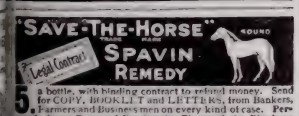
Among the Workers



—EVANGELISTS HART AND MAGANN, of Fairbury, Ill., have just closed a great union meeting at Mount Vernon, Mo. All the churches united to build a tabernacle. Two men's meetings were held out at a large company of men. The business houses of the city closed each afternoon from 3 to 4 P.M. There were many conversions. The evangelists are now holding meetings at Norfolk, Neb.

—G. H. MALONE, American Advent Mission, Hankow, China, writes: "The whole Yangtse valley is now (September 12) practically under water, and the water still rising. Villages, towns and numberless homes have been swept away. Our CHRISTIAN HERALD Orphanages are surrounded by water. Especially is this true of our Boys' Orphanage. In the dining-room the kitchen the water is about three feet deep.

—OUR READERS WILL remember how, two years ago, in the catastrophe that buried Messina, two-thirds of the prosperous Waldensian congregation, with the pastor and his family, perished the sea and fate of 70,000 inhabitants of the doomed city. Americans, through the successful efforts of the American Waldensian Aid Society of New York City and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, sent help to the survivors. It was necessary to have a new chapel erected. Through the help of the government of Norway and Premier Kossuth of Hungary (whose father, the great patriot, was a member of the Waldensian Church in Turin), a wooden chapel was built and opened a few months ago. All the foreign consuls, the member of parliament representative of Messina, officers of the army and navy and a large gathering of intelligent people attended the ceremony. A memorial tablet, commemorating the pastor and his wife and other unfortunate victims of the catastrophe, was unveiled. There are now already about two hundred members and fifty children in the Sunday School.

Once filled with Kerosene it will burn 40 hours. Absolutely odorless. Handsomely constructed of brass, nickel plated. Provided with wick to last several years. Can be used in entries, hallways, closets, nursery and sick room. At your dealer's or by mail (postpaid) 65c.

cockeyed pilots, and schools of grunts and snappers, pass in constant review before your delighted eyes, and many strange and beautiful fish surprise you if you are not acquainted with the fauna and know what to expect. There is the jet black angel-fish, whose tail is a brilliant yellow and on whose glossy back there glow great spots of bright metallic blue.

"It is heart-breaking work to bring these tender denizens of the tropics to the North, especially as late in the season as October. Due to the kindness of Mr. Clifford Mallory we were able to bring home our quarry without expense to ourselves or to the Aquarium. As long as the ship made her way north through the Gulf Stream it was easy sailing for us, for all we had to do was to see that the pumps which circulated the water from the ocean through our tanks were working in good order; but when the rips which mark the edge of the stream came in sight, and showed us where we would pass into water whose temperature is from eighteen to twenty degrees lower than that of the stream, our troubles began. It was then no longer possible to pump sea water into the tanks, so we had to aerate the water which was already there by forcing in warmed air from the engine room. In addition to this, as the temperature of the air dropped the tanks commenced to cool, and for twenty-four hours Mr. Danforth and I carried artificially heated water from the galley to keep our prizes alive. During this time the air-pump broke down and it became necessary for us to stand by and supply the fish with air by means of a hand pump."

In spite of all the beauties which were brought home, the prize of the expedition is a great ugly-looking 250-pound jew-fish or black sea-bass with seventeen spikelike spines on his dorsal fin, well-armed underfins and a most forbidding-looking face. There are four species of this fish to be found around the coasts of the United States, two in the Pacific and two in the Atlantic. This specimen is, however, the largest living one that has ever been exhibited. In the tanks about the walls of the Aquarium are all the curiosities and sparkling little gems of the sea that were the reward of the recent expedition. For true beauty, for a living example of the fairy-handed touch of nature, an iridescent dream from the silent depths of the ocean, probably nothing can excel the butterfly fish. He is a delicate water-color masterpiece, almost circular in shape, and so thin that he is fairly transparent. Bright stripes of sky blue and brilliant straw yellow play upon his sides, and around him just back of the head there is a ring of polished black, and just at the base of his tail he carries a spot which may be black, white, or invisible, as he wishes. The hummingbird-fish, also, has brilliant colors. He is a little fellow, about four inches in length, with a head of brilliant blue and body so green that it glows like bright foliage in the sunlight. Around his neck, if a fish may be said to have any neck, he has three complete rings which shade from chocolate brown to the deepest of black. Many others from the tropic seas carry these same bright colors. The angel-fish is a quiet dove gray in color, but over her sides and back she can sprinkle spots of brilliant blue at will, and along the edges of her feathery fins are stripes as blue as the summer sea. The pork-fish, who gets his name from his pig-like head, the parrot-fish and the elephant-fish, both of whose faces suggest those more familiar creatures for which they are named, are not to be outdone in color. Bright blues and greens, they change at will or fade into a dull gray when they wish to hide themselves from their enemies. Mr. Grant states that all of these brilliant colors disappear at night, and if the fish is taken from the water during the hours of darkness, it is found to be almost pure white.

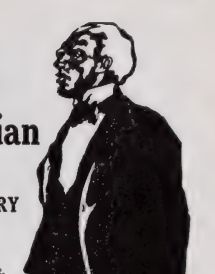
If the expedition brought home some dreams of beauty, they were not alone, for three nightmares came in the same set of tanks. These are the toad-fish, the scorpion-fish and the sharksucker. The first two are chunky little fellows, all angles and covered with innumerable spines and welks and knobs, and with faces that suggest the goblins of the fairy tales of our childhood. The sharksucker has an aversion for work, which induces him to use the suction apparatus with which the top of his head is supplied to attach himself to the body of a larger fish, usually a shark, for locomotion. When his host discovers prey, this slender little fellow darts forward to consume his share and gets back to where he may be towed to the next meal without effort on his part. As the sharksucker is as often in an inverted position as he is right side up, his under side is as dark as his back.

During their recent trip to the South Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Grant got a great deal of amusement from a pelican which of his own initiative had become a tame frequenter of the fish docks at Key West. This fellow suns himself along the water front and makes friends with all comers; the prospect of an easy living at the hands of his fishermen friends seems to interest him far more than the freedom of the open reaches of sky and sea to which he might betake himself at any time. THEODORE RAND-MCNALLY.

A Massacre Averted

MICHAUD, in his history of the Crusades, relates an incident as inspiring as it is affecting for its simple yet wonderful heroism.

The first definite result of the agitation in Europe looking towards the rescuing of Jerusalem from the hands of infidels was a vigorous persecution of the Christian citizens of Jerusalem. One night, so the story goes, a bitter enemy of the Christians threw a dead dog into one of the principal mosques of the city. The next morning, when the desecration was discovered by the early morning worshipers, a threatening clamor resounded throughout the city. Crowds flocked about the mosque angrily demanding the death of all Christians in the city, declaring that only in this way could the outrage be avenged. Soon a decree was out condemning all the Christians in the city to death. At this crucial hour a young man, whose name history has not preserved, entered the church where the Christians were gathered praying, and addressed them after this fashion:



"The greatest misfortune that could happen would be that the church of Jerusalem should perish. When a people is threatened with destruction it is just that a single man should sacrifice himself for the salvation of all. I here and now offer myself as a victim to die for you: to you I leave the charge of doing justice to my memory and I recommend myself to your prayers."

After pronouncing these words, which threw the assemblage into tears, the young man left his friends, repaired to the Mussulman chiefs, asked that he be held accountable for the perpetration of the outrage and that the punishment now menacing the Christians be meted out to him.

The Mussulmans seem to have been satisfied with this victim, the threatened massacre of Christians was averted and the one who had offered himself as a sacrifice went, according to the words of an early writer, "to receive in heaven the reward reserved for those whose minds burn with a love of perfect charity."

up the street, out of danger of falling walls, and he himself had come back to gaze awe-stricken at the line of firemen and others carrying those bodies out of the alley, and putting them down on the sidewalk, row after row. Oh, cover them up fast and close from morbidly unholy view, these young lives, victims of the hellish greed that built a fire-trap without a fire escape (though the law said there should be one), and locked the doors of the factory rooms during the unpaid working hours of girls who toiled among inflammable and health-destroying materials when they should have been happy and laughing creatures in school or out in the fields. Why not? The same as your child or mine. Is there one law of life for a factory girl and another for the daughter of the factory owner?

But oh, the pity of it! Those rows of covered-up bodies! Yet some of the souls that were in them a few minutes ago are happier, no doubt, now than they ever have been before. And that is the only compensation to this tragedy. Is it enough?

Sidney took out his watch. Only a little after four o'clock. In less than half an hour all that had happened. The naval supplies factory was a gutted, tangled mass of ruin. Fifty bodies were somewhere within it. Fifty more were on the sidewalk. A few had escaped. The tenement house had suffered only at one side. The fire-fighters had subdued the enemy there. Every minute increased the number of morbid sight-seers. Ambulances choked up the narrow passages. The department threw ropes across the alley passage, and the police kept the people away.

Sidney mechanically put his watch back. What more could he do? The crime had been committed—the crime of respectable greed against poverty; the story was all there for the newspapers. Yes, there was a newspaper reporter with his camera taking shots at the ruins, the firemen, the crowd, even the bodies. He saw one enterprising reporter even attempt to pull the covering off of a dead body as it was being carried toward an ambulance. He wanted to strike him down. It was the first time even during that half hour's tremendous experiences that he felt his pulses quicken into real fever heat.

The incident passed. A policeman thrust the young man back. The body was hastily pushed into the wagon and another lifted up. Sidney grew sick. He went back, forcing his way slowly through the mass of people, to make inquiry of the group he had left, of the strangely calm old man with the eyes that seemed to see and not to see, of the girl who had helped the others, the girl with the blackened fire-blistered face. But in the confusion he could not find them. He stood aimlessly enough, at last, on the fringe of the mob, gazing at the smoking ruins, wondering over the loss of life, not able to realize his own share in the afternoon's event, an event which he could not understand until long and wonderful years had rolled over his head.

At last he felt himself moving slowly back with the crowd. The police and the fire department needed more room. He was of a decided, positive nature. There was no more he could do. He extricated himself from a heavy-faced group of men who had blocked his way and started up Moore Street to get—he smiled strangely as he said it to himself—to get a hat, when a young man stopped him.

"Oh, you're the young fellow who helped bring people out of the double decker. What is your name?"

"What is yours?"

"I'm representing the New York Megaphone."

"Oh, are you?"

Sidney moved along, and the reporter kept step with him.

"Yes, and I want your name and the particulars. How did you come to be here?"

"How did you?"

"Come. Is that the way to talk on an occasion like this? What's the matter? I only want your story. What's your name?"

"I know him. That's Sidney Cushing, son of Brander Cushing at the ship-yard," said a man whom Sidney recognized as a dock hand.

"Oh! Cushing! Give me your story. I hear you helped several out. Crossed on a board or something. How was that? Give us the story."

The reporter planted himself fairly in front of Sidney and repeated his question.

"What did you do? Give us the story."

"I'll never give it to you," said Sidney slowly.

The reporter looked at him incredulously, hesitated and then said:

"You did save several. On a board between the windows. Who were they?"

Sidney forced his way past him, until he was on the extreme edge of the mob. The reporter followed, still plying him with questions, to which he answered never a word.

Finally the reporter turned back with a smile. "I've got it all, Mr. Cushing. Thanks for your courtesy. You're a hero, all right. And you look it. Must have been great. Don't see why you want to be so modest about talking. I'll get the rest from the family. Howard's the name. Old man's a paralytic blind man."

Sidney turned on him in a fury.

"If you print my name in connection with this horror, I'll—"

"Yes, what?"

"Are you the hound who tried to uncover one of the bodies a little while ago? You are. Any creature who would do a thing like that at such a time as this is not entitled to the name of a man."

The reporter looked at him queerly, but did not seem offended.

"Good stuff! You look it all right." But Sidney turned on him with such a snarl of rage that he backed off and went back into the crowd.

Sidney felt sick at heart, and for the first time he began to realize the condition of his own person. He was hatless, and his face was blackened with smoke and burned in several places. His coat was torn, and his hands were bloody where he had clung to the rough bricks of the window ledge. And now he began to feel the reaction from the excitement and his exertions. Once more he drew into the crowd, fascinated by the horror of it all, and vaguely thinking his duty called him to do something. But there was nothing to do. The police and fire departments had the premises roped off, and no one but those authorized could get inside. The mob had increased to several thousand people. And so he started back to the shipyard office.

Every step of the way he could see those bodies falling, falling! thud! thud! thud! He could see the long rows on the sidewalk and the face of the girl over there in the window encouraging the cripple to go on. He groaned and shuddered as he walked on. When he finally reached the yard it was empty. All the men had heard of the fire and had gone to it in a body. His father's private office was at the extreme end of a row of offices belonging to different members of the company, and back from the noise of the great yard. As he hurried along toward this point, Sidney could not help wondering if his father could be there, ignorant of the great tragedy which had been acting out only a few blocks distant, and he could not avoid a feeling of almost reproach for his father that he could be so indifferent, or so absorbed in the new battleship he was planning, as to let everything else become secondary.

As he reached the office and entered, he saw his father seated in front of a large desk covered with plans. Before his father saw him the telephone rang.

"What!" Cushing was saying. "You don't say! How dreadful! A complete ruin, you say? Lives lost? How many? It's probably exaggerated. I'll go right over."

He turned and saw his son.

"Sidney! What! Where have you been?"

Sidney sat down and cried like a boy.

His father was deeply agitated.

"What is it? Are you hurt? Where have you been? O God! That fire. You are always risking your life over something. Will you never learn—"

Sidney lifted up his head.

"Father, I shall never be able to sleep soundly again. Those bodies—I shall always see them falling, falling—"

His father reached out a hand and laid it on his arm.

"It must have been awful. Is the factory ruined?"

"Yes. An explosion of a defective gas heater. But a hundred lives lost! It is awful! And there were no fire escapes. No way for the poor girls to get out."

Brander Cushing moved uneasily. "No fire escapes!" he repeated to himself.

Now to understand fully the scene that followed one must know that Brander Cushing first of all idolized his son, and in the second place had one great ambition in his heart—that Sidney should succeed him in the great ship-yard as the builder of the greatest and most modern warships known to civilization.

"There were over two hundred girls in the factory. How did they escape?"

"Some of them down the stairways. Some of them——"

"Did you save some of them, Sid?"

"Yes."

"Tell me. It must have been——"

Sidney told him simply and sadly.

"It must have been—it was splendid."

"I don't—I can't dwell on it. My head whirls now. I—I'll wash up."

Sidney went into the adjoining wash room and his father rose and walked nervously back and forth through the office.

"You were not hurt?"

"No, sir. Only bruised a little getting back into the window when the sash broke and the board went down."

"And you don't know who the people were you helped?"

"Some one said it was Howard. The man was blind and paralyzed."

"I know who he is. Used to work in the yard. I think he was hurt during the keel-laying of the Albatross. That was before my time. We will hunt them up."

"Yes. There's a daughter. Mighty brave, cool girl."

Sidney came out of the wash room wiping his face and looking curiously at his father. "I can't understand why there were no fire escapes. Who was responsible?"

His father did not answer.

Sidney sat down and put his hands over his face.

"Father," he said suddenly, in a terrible voice, "I remember now. The company owns the Naval Supplies Building. Two months ago we were notified by the marshal to put in the escapes. His deputy served it when we were here in the office together. Somebody is guilty of the death of those girls. Who is it?"

"Not you."

"Who is, father?" The young man stood up and faced the older one with a look that his father had never before seen there. And Brander Cushing knew in that bitter moment that the first event had happened which might create a breach betwen himeself and his son and perhaps bring to nought his ambitious dream of over twenty years.

RED

It's the Red Blood Corpuscles that Prope Food Makes

An Ohio woman says Grape-Nuts foo gave her good red blood and restore the roses of youth to a complexion tha had been muddy and blotchy. She says

"For 10 years I had stomach troubl which produced a breaking out on m face. The doctors gave it a long Lati name, but their medicines failed to cur it. Along with this I had frequent head aches, nervousness and usually pain i my stomach after meals.

"I got disgusted with the drugs stopped them and coffee off short, an quit eating everything but fruit an Grape-Nuts, with Postum for my tabl beverage.

"The headaches, stomach trouble, an nervous weakness disappeared almos like magic, which showed that when th cause was removed and good food an drink used nature was ready to help.

"My blood was purified and my com plexion became like a young girl's whil my weight was increased from 90 to 12 pounds in a few months—good, solid firm flesh, where it used to be soft and flabby

"I recommended Grape-Nuts an Postum to one of my friends, who wa afflicted as I had been. She followed m advice and in a short time was restored t complete health and in about 8 month her weight increased from 100 to 14 pounds.

"Our doctor, observing the effect o Grape-Nuts and Postum in our cases, de clared, the other day, that he would here after prescribe these food products fo gastritis." Name given by Postum Co. Battle Creek, Mich.

$2300 from 6 Acres of strawberries

M. L. Mebene is a grower in the Gulf Coast Country of Texas and Louisiana. He has a 6-acre patch of strawberries. For his strawberry crop, this past season, he was paid $2300 cash, f.o.b., cars at his home station, Chocolate Bayou, Texas.

This is nothing unusual—and it doesn't tell half the story. Gulf Coast growers get two and sometimes three different crops a year from their land. They are traveling the road to riches at high speed.

Are you doing as well? Don't you think you could manage a few acres in the Gulf Coast Country of Texas and Louisiana? Wouldn't you like to clean up a handsome profit every year and be your own boss while you are doing it?

You can buy a few acres in the Gulf Coast Country of Texas and Louisiana on easy terms and the first crop, if properly cared for, should more than pay for the land.

Better look into this.

Investigate! Go down there this fall or winter. See and talk to these growers. Then you will realize the big opportunities open to you. The trip, by the Frisco, will alone be worth the little cost of going. Excursion fares via the Frisco, the first and third Tuesdays of each month, make the trip inexpensive.

The Frisco Lines operate splendid, electric lighted, all steel trains, daily, from Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, Birmingham and New Orleans. These trains carry through cars, daily, and, on excursion days, through tourist sleepers to the Gulf Coast Country.

3 Splendid Books FREE

One on the Mid-Coast country of Texas, one on the lower irrigated sections of the Rio Grande Valley and one on Louisiana, all beautifully illustrated, showing scenes in actual colors. They describe the country and crops from one end to the other, giving examples of successes, and personal statements by men who have gone there and made good. Young People's Societies

Missions in South America*

IN a recent letter to Woman's Work for Women, the Rev. J. F. Garvin writes of his interesting experiences in Chile. He describes attractively the central valley of Chile, with its immense haciendas (plantations). These are owned by a few rich men, but they pay little attention to the practical conduct of their places, leaving this to superintendents, and neglecting almost altogether the welfare of the farm hands. The consequence is great degradation among the latter, though Mr. Garvin can see signs of improvement. He uses Christian Endeavor methods very largely, for they suit the young, among whom the most hopeful work is done.

We little realize the size of the cities of South America. Here is Talca, with its 50,000 people, only fourteen of whom came to hear this missionary when he preached there last spring. Curico has a population of 20,000 and a splendid modern high school (for its boys), but its Protestant mission occupies only a rented room capable of holding sixty people. The large city of San Fernando, about three hours south of Santiago, has no effective missionary organization.

The Rev. John Christiansen of Venezuela reports that the priests have warned all their parishioners that they must not read the Bibles which the missionaries are distributing everywhere, because the Bible is an immoral book. Mr. Christiansen bids us all rejoice because the restrictions upon religious liberty have been removed from every South American republic except Peru; and that in nearly all of them the better classes of people, especially the government officials, favor missionary work.

The Methodists have six boarding-schools in Brazil and the Presbyterians and Baptists several also. Miss Mary Pescud of Petrolio reports that "indulgences" still exist there. She bought one for fifty cents, which is warranted to release her soul from purgatory sixty days sooner than if she had not bought it. She reports that special masses are still being offered there for the soul of Christopher Columbus; and that the custom is almost universal among the common people, of praying before images and relics, as among the Philippines and most of the other Spanish-speaking countries. Miss Pescud gives good advice to those contemplating missionary work. She says: "Don't go unless you have a deep religious experience. Crossing the equator may not make you better. It may make you worse. Don't go unless you have good health, common sense and also a sense of humor. Especially do not go unless you have mastered the art of living and working with others. Above all things, never go unless you feel sure that God has called you."

Mr. John H. Warner of Brazil related at the Student Conference in Rochester in 1910 some of the absurdities prevalent there in the name of religion. For instance, there is in the State of Minas a wooden statue of Christ, which has long, flowing hair. This hair grows with marvelous rapidity, and is trimmed short every year. The Roman Catholic Church derives a large revenue from the sale of locks of this hair.

Also, there is a story of a fisherman of Bahia, who, after a long period of ill-luck, prayed to the Virgin and she sent him a great fish. He started homeward with joy. To this was added overwhelming astonishment when he discovered that on every scale of the fish was miraculously painted a picture of the Virgin's face. Those scales have been sold by the Church at a good profit for many years.

* Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, November 19. TEXT: Acts 19 : 13-30.

Christ's Right of Way*

IF we give Christ the foremost place in our lives, letting him, as it were, lead the procession of our thoughts, our words, our acts—trooping after him will surely come those beautiful angels which follow him wherever he goes—love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance. When a character is lacking in these, or in a visible struggle to attain them, we may justly conclude that Christ is not given the leading place in that life.

The godliness which is attained by the placing foremost of Christ in the heart, may well be illustrated by the familiar story of old Peter Miller, the good Baptist preacher of Pennsylvania. It was during the Revolutionary War, when nearly every town was thickly sprinkled with "loyalists," who were determined that the patriot cause should not succeed. One of these belonged to Peter Miller's church, and as Peter was an ardent patriot, the old Tory naturally disliked him, and tried in every way to torment and injure him.

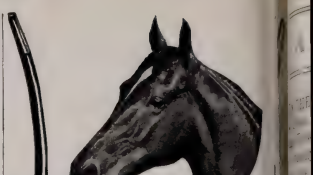
At last the Tory was arrested for treason and was sentenced to be hanged. Then Peter Miller had a chance to prove how wholly he had sunk his own will in that of his Master. Though no longer a young man, he started out to walk the seventy miles between his home and Philadelphia, in order to plead with Washington for the life of his enemy.

Washington listened to him, but he was not moved.

"The man has been detected in the act of giving aid and comfort to the British," he said firmly. "I well know your stalwart devotion to the American cause, but I cannot pardon your friend."

"My friend!" exclaimed Peter Miller. "He is my worst enemy."

"What!" cried Washington. "Have you walked seventy miles in order to save the life of your enemy? That puts the matter in a different light." And he granted the pardon.



Peter Miller literally interpreted Christ's command that we should love our enemies and pray for them that despitefully use us and persecute us. There is no higher test of Christian character. If that test is passed, the man shows that he has sunk himself in his Saviour and that his life "is hid with Christ in God."

But the mere accomplishment of a supreme feat like this is not the whole work. After the attainment comes the endurance. It is in the daily stress that we may best prove our love, and Newman, in one of his most eloquent passages, reminds us that for this constant, never-ending series of temptations and trials we have an unfailing help and defense. "Wherever thou art," he says, "thou canst, through God's incomprehensible mercy, in a moment bring thyself into God's holy church invisible, and receive secretly that aid, the very thought of which is a present, sensible blessing. Art thou afflicted? thou canst pray. Art thou merry? thou canst sing psalms. Art thou lonely, or does the day run heavily? fall on thy knees, and thy thoughts are at once relieved by unseen companions."

The yielding of our wills to the will of God is no easy matter. The human heart longs desperately for its chosen idols. It brings every argument its ingenuity can invent to prove that its will should be done. God beckons to the right path too often in vain. He knows what is best for us. Let him lead the way.

Yield to the Lord with simple heart
All that thou hast and all thou art;
Renounce all strength but strength divine,
And peace shall be forever thine;
Behold the paths the saints have trod,
The paths which led them home to God.

A Great "Queen"

Horse Story

"KATE and QUEEN"

By Prof. Jesse Beery
King of Horse Trainers

Equals the famous "Black Beauty" in human interest—surpasses it in practical ability. "Kate" a victim of poor handling is vividly contrasted with "Queen" who was more fortunate. You sympathize with one—rejoice with the other—even as you sigh for the slum waif and laugh with the child of fortune.

Prof. Beery has skillfully woven into this intensely interesting and true story, many valuable suggestions for handling horses—result of a lifetime's experience.

A Chinese Aristocrat's Home

IN THE aristocratic official class in China (says a writer in the Chicago Tribune), you will find in a typical family six individuals — husband and wife, two other women, and two children. Their monthly household expenses in Canton would be about as follows:

Rent for a house valued at $10,000, $60; eleven men servants, including the porter, four general servants, a cook, assistant cook, and four chair coolies, $37. There will be seven women servants, at a total cost of $17.75, comprising two women's maids at $3 each, two babies' nurses at $4 and three general servants, who also do the family washing, at $1.25 each.

The food for the family would cost $75 a month. The master and three wives have four meals a day: Breakfast, 50 cents; luncheon, 25 cents; dinner, 75 cents; supper, 50 cents. The two meals for the servants cost 25 cents a day. To this must be added rice to the value of $16.50, and $11 for firewood and sundry expenses. Thus the entire living expenses for the family are $217 a month.

The two extra wives are practically slaves. If they bear no children they have no legal status; if they bear children their position in the family is assured. They are subject to the orders of the first wife; their children are considered her children and subject to her direction.

As there always is a steady exodus of men from Canton, the population numbers more women than men. The law does not sanction but on the contrary actually forbids plurality of wives. A Chinaman may have but one wife; there is no limit to the number of concubines he may have. The wife is chosen from the same rank and position in life as that of her husband. Among the higher classes betrothal is usually contracted a few years before the marriage takes place. The young people have no voice in the selection of a life partner, betrothal and marriage being arranged by the nearest eldest male relative. After a formal betrothal is entered into the young man's family send a quantity of cakes to the girl's family, together with "an agreement of engagement and valuable presents to the fiancée herself." The girl's family, in turn, sends gifts of confectionery and a "formal acknowledgment of the engagement."

The marriage ceremony is formal and well defined. About two weeks before the wedding there is an "engagement ceremony." Fortune-tellers and soothsayers determine an auspicious day. The bride is brought to the bridegroom's house in a decorated chair, with considerable pomp. She is received by the bridegroom in the main hall of the house and together they worship—i. e., they kneel facing the street and the family ancestors and prostrate themselves before the house. The bride is conducted to a room by the husband and now probably for the first time sees her husband's face.

Other women are purchased outright. There is no formality beyond the passing of the money and the receipt therefor. Upon arrival at the house they kowtow or ceremoniously kneel before the wife and all the higher members of the family. Under no circumstances do they enjoy the honor and rank accorded the wife.

Household servants are usually furnished food and lodging. Servants in the employ of Europeans expect only lodging. By custom women servants are furnished with bedding. Among the poorer menial classes marriage is generally a matter of convenience. There is little or no formal ceremony and the union is a kind of partnership whereby it is understood that they will look after each other in case of sickness and they hope, of course, that children will come to insure support in their old age. Naturally there cannot be much love in such marriages. The wife generally lives with her husband's parents, where she is the slave of her mother-in-law; the husband sleeps and lives where he works, returning home one or two nights a month.

No Cold in California

Crops Pay for Your Farm

Are you dreading the approach of cold weather? Do you hate to see the time come when you will be shut in by cold, sleet and snow? Do you realize how cold weather practically robs you of four or five months' earnings?

Would you like to get a new location where crops will grow all the year 'round? Would you like to make those lost four months count? Then go to California this winter.

The Santa Fe has no land to sell there, but we do want to see the country built up. We want the business of ten times as many people as are now located in the San Joaquin Valley. We wish to take in the settlers. We want to haul out their crops. Every additional prosperous family means more passengers and freight. You will see therefore why the Santa Fe created its Colonization Department and why we can afford to give you only the truth. We want ambitious people willing to work to help this land produce in its wonderful way.

The San Joaquin Valley is in the heart of wonderful Golden California—land of sunshine. It is 250 miles long and 100 miles wide. Only about 200,000 people live there now. Its farms are producing wonderful crops, and its people are contented and fast gaining independence and accumulating bank accounts. Ten times as many people would be equally prosperous.

There are many opportunities to acquire land, as the owners, too, are anxious for new settlers. The new comer is welcomed and assisted by his neighbors. We will gladly put you in touch with the people of that land itself. We will give you the names of those who offer homes on the most liberal terms.

One particularly interesting proposition is a wonderful plan whereby half of your crops pay for your farm. A limited number of farms only are available under this plan, but they are most desirable land and situated in one of the finest counties of the San Joaquin Valley. The tracts are 40 acres and you agree to turn over one-half the gross proceeds of crops from 35 acres each year until the farm is fully paid for. Only 5 per cent. interest is required and a reasonable first payment. You will be carried if you should have a crop failure.

Not many opportunities such as this are offered. Those who act quickly will get a San Joaquin Valley farm that will make them a competence.

We have not the space here to tell you much about the San Joaquin Valley. Enough to say only a few words about its most delightful climate, wealth-producing soil and wonderful variety of crops.

January is like our June and so things grow all the time. June, July and August, of course, are warm, but it is dry, not enervating heat. The nights are cool and the heat is wanted to make money for everybody in the summer fruit ripening season.

The soil rich, deep and fertile, under irrigation, produces abundant and varied crops. You can have something to market every month. Alfalfa grows several crops a year and eventually you may have a succession of fruit, including prunes, apricots, melons, figs, oranges, lemons, grape fruit, olives, grapes and raisins.

You ought to read about this country and then go see it. See it this winter while work is slack with you. You can go cheaply. The Santa Fe runs comfortable tourist sleeping cars in which the trip can be made at least expense. Full information about train and fares will be gladly given.

Mail this coupon or write to-day. Get our literature about the San Joaquin Valley and our monthly land journal, "The Earth," for six months free. Let us put you in touch with the owners offering the wonderfully liberal half crop payment plan.

THE MOTHER OF AMERICAN METHODISM

THE John Street Methodist Church of New York City, familiarly known as "Old 44 John Street," which bears the enviable title of "The Cradle of American Methodism," celebrated its one hundred and forty-fifth birthday on October 29. The entire day was occupied by services of a memorial and devotional character. At 9.30 in the morning Mr. Charles H. Applegate, who has been for fifty-four years a member of the church, conducted a regular old-time Methodist class meeting and love feast, and at 10.45 Rev. Thomas Hamilton Lewis, D.D., president of the General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church and also president of the Western Maryland College at Westminster, Maryland, preached the anniversary sermon. After the service had been opened by Dr. Lewis R. Streeter, the pastor, and prayer had been offered by Judge Lowe, Dr. Hamilton chose for his subject "John Wesley's Salvation by Faith." In the course of the sermon he seized the opportunity to present many old ideas that are very dear to the heart of the Methodist denomination. At an afternoon service, the platform was occupied by a large number of clergymen and laymen who brought greetings from sister churches and the daughters of the mother church, and who spoke on "The State and the Church" and "The Outlook for Methodism."

At 6.45 in the evening the Epworth League Chapter held a birthday reception and social service, and at 8 o'clock the regular evening service was held. Rev. Franklin Hamilton, D.D., chancellor of the American University at Washington, D. C., preached on the subject "The Cup of Fire." Dr. Hamilton adapted his sermon specially to the young people of the congregation and the delegates of one hundred and fifty Epworth League societies who were present. The old John Street Church is located in a part of the great metropolis which is now miles away from the residential section of the city, though at the time the first building was erected it was on the outskirts. There is perhaps no church among the evangelical denominations in America which has a more interesting history.

A Recent Service in the John Street Church

In the year 1760 Philip Embury, a young Irishman who had been appointed a local preacher two years before at the Limerick Conference, emigrated to New York and took up his residence in John Street. Embury was a carpenter and for the first six years followed his trade in America, and we do not learn that he made any serious attempt to rally his fellow Christians. In the spring of 1766, however, he came in contact with Barbara Heck. Like Embury, Barbara Heck had come from Ireland and was a Methodist, but unlike him she was neither diffident nor constrained by those about her. After having attracted attention by an informal raid upon a public-house, she sought out Embury and induced him to start services in his own home. This he did, preaching to a congregation of five—his wife, Paul and Barbara Heck, John Lawrence, and Betty, a colored servant belonging to the Hecks. That was the beginning of Methodism in America, in October, 1766. To-day American Methodism comprises seventeen denominations with a total membership of nearly 7,000,000, and represents a population of over twenty millions. It was not long before this little company of pioneers had added to its numbers until the room in Embury's house had become too small to accommodate them. Then a larger room was rented and classes were formed. The little church prospered, and it was quoted concerning it, "The Lord added to the church daily

STONING JESUS

TEXT: John 10:31 "Then the Jews took up stones again to stone him."

THE shining of the sun in this world produces two opposite effects. The sun shines, and everything is enlivened, made beautiful, and brought on to perfection. The same sun shines, and everything is marred; death stands in the way of its shining. The Gospel is the same. It is the savour of life unto life, of death unto death, one or the other. The same sun that strikes upon the ice and melts it strikes upon the clay and hardens it. The Gospel is working in one way or the other in your life. No man can hear the Gospel without his heart either becoming more tender or more hardened. No one can listen to the proclamation of the truth without being more fully persuaded to surrender his will, or going away into a life of stubbornness and wilful rejection of God. I suppose there is no Gospel in the New Testament that gives a better illustration of this than the Gospel of St. John. It is a Gospel of love and of life.

The Divine Love

I wonder if you can find in the New Testament anything more beautiful than this: "For God so loved the world." Or words more beautiful than these: "Jesus wept." Only two words, and yet the whole of the sinning, sorrowing world listens to them, and every one whose heart has been almost broken is comforted as he reads them again and again through his tears. And yet, while this Gospel of St. John brings to us his thought of beauty and note of sympathy, it is also in the same Gospel that we find the text about the stoning of Jesus. There are two texts about stoning him. The first is in John 8: 59—"Then took they up stones to cast at him." The second text is as follows (John 10: 31): "Then the Jews took up stones again to stone him." It is as if they had dropped the stones from their hands for the moment, charmed, maybe, by his speech, thrilled by his message, when suddenly his words stirred them through and through. "And they took up stones again to stone him." Jesus had just said, "I and my Father are one." In other words, he said, "I am one with Him who called the worlds into existence; with Him who brought the children of Israel out of Egypt into Canaan." And you would have thought that all the Jews listening to him, when they looked into his face, would have said, "It is not the carpenter's son, it is the Messiah," and that they would have bowed their heads to worship him. But instead of that "they took up stones again to stone him." Then one of the most pathetic utterances that ever fell from the lips of Jesus follows: "Many good works have I showed you from my Father; for which of those works do ye stone me?"

My subject is an illustration of the fact that men who are models of fairness in other matters are most unfair with Jesus. If an ordinary malefactor had been arrested in the days of Jesus he would not have been stoned without a trial. They would have led him forth in the highway, with a crier going ahead of him, announcing the crime which was charged against him, calling forth the name of his accuser, announcing the names of witnesses for and against him, calling out to the crowd, "If any one knows anything in favor of this man, let him step forth and speak." But they did not treat Jesus in that way. They stoned him with stones without a trial. They stoned him with stones without a witness. Why didn't they allow the man whose eyes had been opened to speak for him? Why didn't they allow the people whose dead had been raised to testify for him? Why didn't they allow the sick people to speak on his behalf? Why didn't they allow the men who had been in the bondage of sin and set free to testify to his saving, uplifting power?

"Unfair" Christians

The subject is an illustration of the fact that men who are fair in other matters are unfair with God. There is many a man who is unfair in his treatment of the Bible, who rejects it without reading it, turns away from it without testing it; and there is not a man who would not discredit himself as a scientist if he were to treat scientific books as he treats the Bible, who would not discredit himself as a philosopher if he should treat a book of philosophy as he treats the Bible. You approach the Bible in one way, and it will shut up its leaves and give you no sweetness; but approach it in another way, and it will open up before you like a beautiful plant, and give you all the fragrance of God's love.

At our Bible Conference there came to us from the East a blind girl who could not read as the blind people ordinarily read. She met at our conference a blind man, who said she could master the art of reading if she would. So she learned to read upon raised letters with her fingers. One of my friends wanted to give her a Christmas present. The day before Christmas he placed a Bible in her room, and said to her mother, "When she comes in on Christmas morning, do not tell her what it is." When the girl came in to receive her gifts, her mother said, "My dear, here is a present for you." She reached forth her hand in her blindness and took it. It was open at the Gospel according to St. John: "In my Father's house are many mansions." She had no sooner touched it with her hands than she sprang back, and, throwing her arms around her mother's neck, said: "Mother, it is the Bible. I know it by its touch." And listen: If you who have rejected God's Word will go at it with your heart, you will come to know it; if you will receive it in your life, you will believe it. But you have been unfair with the Bible.

There are many who have been unfair with Jesus Christ. They have never tried him; they have never fulfilled his conditions. Sometimes we sneer at a man who confesses conversion. I call you to-day to be fair and square in your treatment of him.

At the close of a special mission a man rose up to say that he discredited everything that the preacher had to say. He said Jesus Christ was a myth that had deceived the Christian world. He had no sooner taken his seat than a man rose quietly and said: "Thirty years ago I came into this community vile as the vilest. I signed pledge after pledge only to break them. I promised my wife and children that I would do better, only to fall into the depths of sin. Thirty years ago in a mission I saw Jesus; thirty years ago in that mission I dropped on my knees and confessed my sin, and for thirty years I have been an honored member of society in this city, and an officer in the church. If Jesus Christ is a myth, explain my life." You have not been fair with Jesus.

A Telling Illustration

The great agnostic, Robert G. Ingersoll, it is said, was one morning seated in a Washington city hotel, looking out of the great window, when a United States Senator, coming in, said: "Mr. Ingersoll, I saw a sad thing a moment ago. I saw a man struggling across the crowded street on crutches, and I saw another man strike the crutches away from him." And Ingersoll rose with fingers twitching and eyes flashing and said, "I should like to see the man. I would punish him." The United States Senator put his hand on his shoulder and said, "That is what you have been trying to do for years: striking away the crutches of people, the support of people in sorrow, the support of people in temptation." This incident may or may not be true, but as a matter of fact that is what he did. You have not been fair with Jesus. What are the stones that men cast at him?

I wonder if you recollect the pathetic sayings in the life of the Master. First, "One of you shall betray me." Second, "Ye shall all be offended because of me." Third, "Could ye not watch with me one hour?" The saddest thing that Jesus Christ ever said in his ministry he said to his own followers. The stone that hurts Jesus Christ the most is not the stone that is hurled by the agnostic, it is not the stone that is hurled by the infidel. The stone that hurts him most is the one that is cast by the man who professes one thing and lives another; the stone cast by the man whose name is on the church books and who lives unlike Christ in business; the stone cast by the man who calls himself a church officer and will cheat in trade. And you never said an unkind thing, you never did an inconsistent thing, you were never unkind in your home, never unscrupulous in your business, never unjust to the poor, if you are a Christian so-called, that you did not hurl a stone at Jesus. That is what hurts him. God pity you. I cannot understand how any one could stone Jesus. Why should you stone him who suffered and died for you?

One of the officers of my church was once a great contractor in Ireland. He told me that one day he was working on a building—I think it was in Cork. He thought the men were carrying the line one wrong. He said, "I came down from the scaffold to look at it. The men were working three stories up. I saw that they were working just in the place where the danger was greatest and the line crookedest. I put my hands to my mouth and shouted up, saying, 'Stand aside for a moment!' The workmen stepped back on the scaffolding, but one man stepped back too far and lost his balance. He was falling down to the ground. Death seemed inevitable, when one man by my side rushed up and put forth his arms to save him. The falling man struck him on the arm, bounded over on to the ground, and was scarcely injured. But the man who saved him had his arms driven down into the arm-sockets, and had his spine twisted. We took him away to the hospital. Afterward, when I was in Ireland, I saw him working his way along the streets, twisted out of shape. But," said he, "let me tell you that the man he saved divided with him." More than that, he said he took the wages he made from that day to the present time, and cut them in half, and gave half to his savior. You applaud that, but I tell you of One to-day who was beaten with stripes, was scourged with many scourgings, suffered in Gethsemane, and died on Calvary, for you. Shame on you if you stone him!

The Stone of Indifference

If I were an inconsistent man to-day I would do one of two things. I would either get right with God, or I would go to the minister and take my name off the church books. I would do one or the other. Don't stone Him!

I want to close my message by saying just a word or two concerning the stones that the world's people cast at Him. Some men cast the stone of Indifference. You would not do it if you knew his power. Some men cast the stone of Rejection. How could you do it? It is heartless. Some men cast the stone of Hatred. I was told the other day of a conversation overheard by one of our friends. A gentleman was asked to be a Christian, when with a sneer and a flash of the eye he said, "Christianity? It is just an insolvency court. That is all it is." But you cannot sneer Christ out of consideration. I am glad it is an insolvency court, for I am glad that when a man comes to the end of all human effort, when he comes to the end of all will power, when he comes to the end of all human strength and sympathy, he can fly to Jesus.

The End of Human Effort

Don't stone Him because of what he was—"chiefest among ten thousand" and "One altogether lovely." Don't stone him because of what he is—the revelation of God to man. I can perfectly understand how unsaved men cannot understand God. He holds the winds in his fists, in the hollow of his hands the seas beat and throb. But I will tell you how you may know him: A friend of mine went into a German artist's studio one day. The artist said, as he held up a piece of parchment about the size of a book, "What is this?" My friend said, "I should say it was a piece of parchment, on which you have cleaned your brushes." "Oh," said the German artist, "take this glass and look at it. I will carry it back into the studio, where the light can strike it properly. When you look through the glass, tell me what you see." My friend, who is a judge of art, looked through the glass at that bit of parchment, which seemed like a piece of paper dabbed with the artist's paint, and suddenly, when the light touched it in the right way, he said, "I saw the shoulder of a mountain. I saw the play of a little mountain stream. I almost saw the waving of the branches of the trees. The glass made the difference."

I say to every one, if you get your eyes fixed upon Jesus by faith and hold them there, willing to be taught, ready to repent, you will know God and love Christ. Don't reject him. I care not what your sin may be. It may be intemperance, or it may be some other form of sin. Jesus can save you. Look unto him. Look unto him. God help you!

MY PATH

OD'S path is mine,
And in His steps I walk with willing feet;

all the same;
e leadeth, and the pathway safe will guard;
l thus I claim
rotection at His hands, and fear discard.

knows His need,

Haste, though with weary feet, to do his mand.

Amusing School Blunders

A PUBLIC school teacher who had just returned from a trip East says a writer in the Tribune Magazine) had been telling her friends some rather amusing incidents given her by a Washington colleague who had just completed final examinations in her grade.

One of the early questions she gave out in her examination was this: "Name the five races of man." Judge of her astonishment when she got this answer to her question: "Automobile races, horse races, foot races, and bicycle races."

Another question was, "Name some of the organs of man." To this the reply came back, "Mouth organ, hand organ, pipe organ."

The spinal cord was defined as "a string running from the back of the head to the base of the heels."

"Ears," said one, "are just as important as good clothes, and should be taken care of just as well. Don't let bugs crawl into your ears; but, if one should get in, then syringe your ear with soapsuds, and afterward drop some molasses into it."

"Poison," wrote another, "should be doctored at once, and not allowed to run on, as it is dangerous. Poison ought to be kept in a little room under lock and key in a small bottle and not let nobody go in there."

A class of pupils were asked to write a short biography of Longfellow. The youngest member of the class proudly submitted the following:

"H. W. Longfellow was a grand man. He wrote both poems and poetry. He graduated at Bowdoin, and afterwards taught the same school where he graduated. He didn't like teaching, and decided to learn some other trade; so his school furnished him money to go to Europe and learn to be a poet. He wrote many beautiful poems for children. He wrote 'Billy the Blacksmith.'"

The Coming of the Bridegroom

THE familiar illustration of the Kingdom of Heaven given by the Lord Jesus in the parable of the Ten Virgins, is specially applicable to the condition of Christendom in these last days of the world. The Christian element, as represented by "the ten virgins which took their lamps and went forth to meet the bridegroom," is typical of the great body of professing Christians throughout the length and breadth of the earth. Five of these representatives were wise; the other five were foolish. The last took lamps, as the wise did, but took no oil with them. Oil is typical of consecration; a spiritual dedication of the body to the service of God; the essential part of a Christian's divine equipment; in fact, without it, profession has only a brief endurance.

The Christian's hope is the second coming of the Lord Jesus; this time to gather the redeemed of God from the earth and conduct them into the presence of the Father. When Jesus had finished the work given him, he ascended into the glories from whence he came. The disciples who witnessed the event were in the presence of two angels. These holy messengers gave witness that "this same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."* "Be ye therefore ready, for the Son of Man cometh at an hour when ye think not."†

There is nothing in Prophecy yet to be fulfilled before the return of the Lord Jesus in person.‡ The exact time is known only to God, but the signs of his early appearance are numerous. Many Christians are relapsing into a lethargic sleep. Spiritual lamps that once glowed with brilliant flame are dimmed by an atmosphere of worldliness; yet the voice from heaven is still pleading, "Watch: be ready." The redeemed may soon hear the cry from heaven: "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh."§ The guest chamber is already illuminated; its radiance is flashing to the most distant part of the realms of man. The celestial vault will scintillate as a sea of diamonds, yet with all the brilliancy revealed to the eye of the redeemed, and the melody of joy and praise from myriads of saints and angels, none will see, none will hear, except those who have part with Christ.

Since the evening Christ was laid in the tomb, none but the Apostles and his disciples have ever beheld his body. No unregenerated soul will witness the rapture of the redeemed:‖ none will ever again behold his person until he comes to "send forth judgment unto victory.¶ It was only his disciples who witnessed his ascension and received the assurance of his return.

Who can conceive the condition of the world following the day of the resurrection? Whole families will have disappeared; faithful stewards will have abandoned their master's service; social conditions everywhere will be paralyzed. The sudden hiatus in the world's affairs will be a phenomenon that scientists may attempt in vain to explain. Great men will abandon rather than attempt to elucidate the subject. Events of an appalling nature, following closely upon the great social convulsion, will dismay the most optimistic.

"We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad."* Every act in our lives not in accord with the spirit of holiness will be reproved. Discord, and disagreements between Christians that have not been reconciled and good feeling restored while in life, will be manifested to their shame in the presence of the Lord and our brethren. Every Christian should bear a spotless record while in life. The careless cannot feel sure of any reward at the judgment, beyond his entry into heaven. Without works, and with faith almost nominal, what has he to expect? In the language of Job in his affliction, he may then say, "I am escaped with the skin of my teeth."

It is said impressions once made on the mind will never be effaced. Many instances have been given to sustain this conclusion. Memory will revive every event in past life when called upon to produce them. May we not suggest that our memory will be God's witness in the great tribunal, when confronted by the perfect law of holiness? Will we not then be reminded that we have not used the precious ointment of love and charity when we had the opportunity?

About seven years from the rapture of the saints, Christ will again return to our earth, "to be glorified in his saints."† They will be endowed with such perfect wisdom that the world and angels will be committed to their judgment.‡ In the first half of this period "the Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations."§ Every innovation that the world may require to satisfy ambition will respond to the wisdom of man. In the last half of the seven-year period, iniquity will abound; and a time of great tribulation, until the world is startled by the sudden appearance of Christ and the Bride.

"Blessed are they which are called unto the marriage supper of the Lamb."‖ E. A. FITZGERALD.

Bread Cast Upon the Waters

BREAD, cast before a hungry tramp has come back to a Port Chester, N. Y., man in the shape of a reformed life devoted to uplifting other vagabonds. To be sure, kindness was the accompaniment of the bread.

Six years ago a "hobo" went to the residence of Village Trustee Willis P. Clark, and asked for food. Compassionately, Mr. Clark fed the man and secured work for him in the village. After working faithfully a few weeks the stranger got intoxicated and left town. Two years later he again appeared, and once more Mr. Clark befriended him. The desire for drink, however, got the better of him, and, leaving his position, he disappeared.

"Recently a stranger walked into my store and extended his hand to me in greeting," says Mr. Clark. "I could not for the life of me recognize the man. He was well-dressed and clean-shaven. Finally I did recognize in him a likeness to the unkempt beggar who had come to me twice, and the visitor smilingly admitted that he was the individual. He accounted for the change by telling me that he had reformed and was now a missionary among the tramps. Walking from place to place, selling small articles to pay expenses, he is pointing every hobo he meets to the way to a better life. Knowing their habits and how to approach them he says that he is able to influence many of them for good.

"As he picked up his satchel to leave he said: 'I always thank the Lord and Willis P. Clark for the change that has been brought about in my own life.'"

COMFORT

COME and drink the living waters
The eternal fountains pour;
Freely drink, and thou shalt find that
Thirst is quenched forevermore.
Though the noon-day sun be blazing,
And the air with heat be rife,
He will satisfy the thirsty
In the desert ways of life.

"Come to Me, ye weary-laden—
Come, and ye shall be at rest!"
He will let you droop that weary,
Weary head upon His breast.
Though He saith unto the Marys,
"Thou dost choose the better part,"
For the toiling, careworn Marthas
Tender pity fills His heart.

"Do not let your heart be troubled,
Neither let it be afraid,"
For the Lord will surely care for
All the creatures He has made.
Though unto the earth's foundations
Raging tempests shake the land,
Know ye that the Father holds you
In the hollow of His hand.

Transformed by a Sermon

STEPHAN BARUMOFF, of Samokov, before his conversion expended most of his energy in doing all kinds of mischief. Among his pastimes was persecuting the Protestants of his town; not that he knew much about them, or had ever attended their services, but on the general principle that heretics deserved punishment. It was an interceding Providence that led the local evangelical pastor to preach on stealing, the first time that Stephan Barumoff ever stepped foot in the Evangelical church. It was on a Sabbath evening after the young man had been out to plunder the neighbors' orchards and vineyards. In amazement he listened to a description of his soul's disease and its remedy. It somehow seemed as if God had stretched out a hand to his rescue.

Thereafter his energy was spent in searching out and relieving the needy. Had a family no wood, Stephan Barumoff was a volunteer to go to the mountains and cut, split and haul the needed wood. Was there no food? The youth gave away his own dinners and suppers. Was there a famine over in Russia? Not having money, he placed in the collection quite a valuable ring, the gift of a friend. The need of friendless children so strongly appealed to him that, with faith in God, he opened a home for them, and now, after four years, the city council of Samokov has voted to support fifteen children there. Some are there from Macedonia, and some from Rouschuk, who lost their fathers in the riots created by a Jewess changing her faith to marry an orthodox Bulgarian. One small boy was rescued from sleeping on the streets; one girl had never known a woman's care or training, her adopted father having taken the entire care of the child after his wife's death. Good people in Samokov take an interest in the orphanage and help pay the running expenses.

WE'RE GROWING OLD

THE tallest lilies droop at eventide,
The sweetest roses fall from off the stem;
The rarest things on earth cannot abide,
And we are passing, too, away like them;
We're growing old!

We had our dreams, those rosy dreams of youth!
They faded and 'twas well. This after-prime Hath brought us fuller hopes; and yet, forsooth,
We drop a tear now in this later time,
To think we're old!

We smile at those poor fancies of the past—
A saddened smile, also akin to pain;
Those high desires, those purposes so vast.
Ah, our poor heart! They cannot come again!
We're growing old!

We move along and scatter as we pace
Soft graces, tender hopes on every hand.
At last, with gray-streaked hair and hollow face,
We step across the boundary of the land
Where none are old!

Dr. Sun Yat Sen, One of the Directors of the Revolution

By WILLIAM DURBAN, D.D.

CHINA'S revolution, which on October 30 culminated in the capitulation of the Manchu government to the demands of the National Assembly and the chiefs of the revolutionary army, has been one of the briefest on record. After a series of military successes, made possible by general disaffection among the imperial troops, and which included the capture of Hankow and the surrender of Sian, the revolutionary army, 27,000 strong, prepared to attack Peking. An ultimatum was sent to the throne demanding that it immediately grant the entire reform programme (which you outlined in last week's CHRISTIAN HERALD). The recall of Yuan Shi Kai to power marked the turning-point of the whole situation. It is believed to have been due to his influence and advice that, at the supreme crisis, the imperial government, under threat of an attack on the capital, accepted the situation and, rather than face an inglorious defeat, granted all the revolutionary demands. A series of edicts issued October 30, in the name of the Emperor, marks the passing of supreme power from the imperial clan which has ruled China since 1644. That power now goes into the hands of the Chinese people, who, through their representatives, will formulate their own constitution and make their own laws. Of course, there may be unforeseen storms ahead; but the present aspect promises well for the future of China.

This insurrection differs radically from the Tai Ping rebellion, which lasted under Hung Hsiu Chwan from 1851 till 1864. The title of Tai Ping, or Universal Peace, was grotesquely parodied by the devastating and revolting barbarities of the rebels. The present movement is purely political. No superstition is involved, and religious complications are absent. The Tai Ping upheaval could not have led to the formation of a popular or republican administration. The present rebellion may, by a natural sequence, end in such a result. All talk of the presidency in such a republic of Dr. Sun Yat Sen or any other particular leader is purely conjectural, and such speculations are irrelevant. The main interest lies in the probable consequences, both to China and to the outside world, of the creation of purely democratic institutions in the vast and venerable empire.

As for the effect upon the nation itself, whether it becomes a republic or a constitutional monarchy, we may expect to witness a steady gravitation toward American institutions. This will be inevitable, indeed, seeing that China has been for many years more truly influenced by the United States than by all the rest of the world together, the influence in this case being entirely favorable. Of all the Great Powers, America is the only one that is not regarded askance by the Chinese. Some are hated, some feared, some looked at with suspicion. Britain possesses the great port of Weihaiwei as a naval station, and owns Hongkong as well as a plot of territory on the adjacent mainland. Germany took Kiauchau under her flag. Russia, till Japan dealt a mortal blow to her policy of colossal grab, not only overran Manchuria, but had designed to overshadow both China and Japan, as well as Korea, with her suzerainty; while England, France, and Germany undoubtedly purposed to checkmate that encroachment by slicing the Celestial Empire into spheres of influence. All such conspiracies are but ugly visions of a disgraceful past. The point is that America alone never has been even suspected of the slightest wish to appropriate a square yard of Chinese territory, and has never shown any disposition toward an aggressive policy with regard to the empire. Also the return of the famous indemnity money by the United States Government is the theme of admiration throughout all China.

Pilgrims to a Mountain Monastery

What the world may anticipate, should the revolutionary success be complete, is the erection of a vast Chinese commonwealth of a certain type, that ty being very largely Columbian. I found this exp tation also on the fact that the patriotism of t Chinese is even more intensely provincial th national. There is comparatively little of the c lective national consciousness in so huge an empi in which the dialects of distant provinces are m tually unintelligible, and in which intercommunic tion has been impossible on any very great sca What sympathy, for example, can be imagined subsist between the citizens of Peking in the nor and those of Amoy, far away in the south? Wh can the singular Miao tribes of the mountains in t far west of the empire care about the people of t Manchurian realms?

Thus, by the very nature of things, China woul under a condition of popular government, nece sarily tend to the process of formulating State rights. Each of the eighteen provinces would co stitute a splendid commonwealth. Indeed, the vic royalty system has by long practice consolidated semi-independence among these great provinci communities. The present government has unwi tingly paved the way for such a future by the recer innovations in the shape of the provincial assembli created in conjunction with the tentative parliamen called the National Assembly, at Peking. This pa liament quickly came into very violent collision wit the Grand Council, that farcical and corrupt cou coterie of which the dissolute Prince Ching, th regent, is the head, while court ladies and eunuch with the new Empress Dowager, Princess Yehonal constitute the sinister "power behind the throne."

The leaders of the revolutionary movement ar in close touch with committees in Indo-China, Ma lacca, the Philippines, Australia, Japan, Burma Siam, New Zealand, South Africa, Britain, and i California, Chicago, and New York. Fury rage against the Manchu class everywhere. In any cas their day is over.

A reunited and reformed China would demand a inviolate territory. The great new nation woul proceed to organize on modern conditions such arma ments, military and marine, as might be needed t back legitimate claims. Russia in Mongolia an Japan in Manchuria have taken up aggressive posi tions which would be untenable as soon as the Chi nese commonwealth felt assured of its giganti strength. And the unknown potentialities of tha strength, never yet really tested, would be calculate to give very serious pause to foreign statesmen.

With the elimination of the effete and tyrannica Manchu oligarchy, there will come to the front with all their wonderful capacities, hitherto cruell restrained, th very fines representatives of the pur Chinese race. Sinim wil come to its own at last Yuan Shi Kai, often calle the "Strong Man of China," who was relegated to ob scurity by the presen regent as so as he hac succeeded in organizing a modern army, and has now been servilely entreated t return to the help of the terrified government, would probably take his natura place at the top, together with his brilliant right-hand man, Pu Lun, and the equally ient Tang Shao Li, bo of whom were involve in his disgrace. But while Pu Lun is the one progressive member of the Chinese dynastic family, and is thus a Manchu, Yuan Shi Kai is a real Chinese, who has

America's Armada in the Hudson

A Section of the Vast Crowd That Went to See the Warships as They Lay at Anchor in the Hudson

FROM October 29 to November 2, the greatest fleet of war vessels that has ever been gathered under the flag of the United tes lay at anchor in the Hudson River, osite the city of New York. One hundred and vessels, representing all the classes in the navy, posed this immense flotilla, which in several s stretched from Fifty-seventh Street to SpuyDuyvil, a distance of about eight miles. Along New Jersey shore, opposite the main line of the vy battleships, the torpedo boats and destroyers re arranged in double columns. Between these the main line was another composed of isers, gunboats and auxiliaries. The submaes formed still another line, their position being ng the New York shore of the river. As a great val display this mobilization surpassed the recent rman review at Kiel and the later gathering of French navy in the harbor of Toulon, and stood ct to the prodigious show which Great Britain de of her fleet in the Solent to honor the coronan of her naval king, George V.

The tonnage of this fleet was 577,285, the eater proportion of this being absorbed by the enty-four battleships. All the ships carry the st modern armament, and even were there no flags sight they would have been easily recognizable as nited States vessels, for nearly all have the new eleton masts which have become a distinguishing ature of our navy. The coal-carrying capacity of the ships taken together was 133,876 tons. To ar Admiral Hugo Osterhaus fell the honor of mmanding this, the second largest mobilization of odern sea power that the world has ever seen. conding Admiral Osterhaus in command of the ttleship and cruiser divisions of the fleet were ar Admirals Charles J. Badger, Aaron Ward, adley A. Fiske, and Thomas B. Howard; while e divisions of gunboats, torpedo boats, destroyers, bmarines and auxiliary ships were commanded by mmanders, Captains and Lieutenants, in the der of their seniority in the service.

When the fleet was in its final position, the flagship nnecticut lay off Fifty-seventh Street. North of r were the following ships in the order named: e Michigan, which is one of the new all-big-gun ttleships; the Delaware and her sister ship the orth Dakota; then the Louisiana, the Vermont d the New Hampshire; next came the South Carina, a sister ship of the Michigan, and then the Kansas, the Minnesota, the Missouri, the Ohio, the Mississippi, the Idaho, the Georgia, the Nebraska, the New Jersey, and the Virginia. Then came the armored cruiser Washington and above her the North Carolina. Next in line were those veterans of the Spanish-American War, the Iowa, the Indiana and the Massachusetts; and the two new dreadnoughts, the Florida and the Utah, completed the line at its northern end. These last two ships are the most recent additions to the navy, and have the distinction of being among the five largest battleships now afloat. Both these ships joined the fleet from the New York Navy Yard, where the Florida had just been completed and where the Utah had been undergoing some slight repairs. In type these ships are so nearly alike that many of their own men have difficulty in distinguishing them until they get close enough to count the black bands upon the funnels, which tell the initiated the name of the vessel. This is true not only of the Utah and the Florida, but of a number of other vessels in the fleet. For instance, there are the sister ships Delaware and North Dakota, Michigan and South Carolina; and the six vessels of the Louisiana class are identical in every detail, while the five of the Virginia type are so alike that it is difficult to distinguish them.

All day Sunday one of the biggest crowds that ever gathered on the Hudson River waterfront thronged Riverside Drive to get a look at the great fleet. It is believed that upward of a million people visited the river bank that day, and about fifty thousand made calls aboard the vessels. Many persons, unfamiliar with the signal flags flown by the different ships, were consumed with curiosity as to the meaning of a white pennant bearing in its centre a blue cross, that floated at the masthead of some of the ships that morning. That flag meant that the naval chaplains who were in New York with the fleet were holding religious services aboard the flagships of the different divisions. These services were attended by several thousands of the bluejackets and marines.

During the two following days crowds almost as large as those of Sunday went out to see the nation's great fighting-machines. During the entire time that the ships lay in the river and the throngs of people went to see them, there was practically no disorder in that section of the city. The crowd that went by day had gone out to learn the difference between an armored cruiser and a modern dreadnought, and they wanted to see a torpedo-boat destroyer which can make faster time than the swiftest of ocean liners. The crowd which went in the evenings to the Drive were interested in the splendid illuminations of the ships. All up and down the line the battleships and cruisers were outlined in fire by thousands of incandescent bulbs. The masts and funnels were all picked out by points of light and no detail of the ship's outline had been missed by the enthusiastic naval electricians. The smaller craft, which are never decorated in this way, added their share to the brilliance by a continuous play of their searchlights.

The reason for this great gathering of warships at New York was that they might be inspected by George von L. Meyer, the Secretary of the Navy, and reviewed by President Taft. At 2 P.M. on November 1, Secretary Meyer, accompanied by the members of the Senate and House Committees on Naval Affairs, inspected the fleet. Not one of the vessels was overlooked, and the entire ground of inspection, with its accompanying barking of salutes by each ship as the Secretary went aboard, was hardly more than finished before it was time to turn on the lights for the evening illumination.

On Thursday, the last day of the mobilization, President Taft reviewed the fleet. About 9:30 in the morning he left the train, upon which he was hurrying south, at Jersey City and boarded the Presidential yacht, the Mayflower. After his flag had been broken to the breeze the yacht got under way and was greeted by a Presidential salute of twenty-one guns from the Connecticut, where the Commander-in-Chief of the Atlantic fleet was visited and the President received the Division Commanders. Then, accompanied by a continuous roar of salutes which are his due as President of the United States and Commander-in-Chief of the Navy, Mr. Taft, with Secretary Meyer and Commander Philip Andrews, the new head of the Navigation Bureau, passed up and down the lines of the fleet. In the afternoon, the President's yacht and the dispatch boat Dolphin, on which were about one hundred guests, including the Committees on Naval Affairs, anchored off the Statue of Liberty at Bedloe's Island, while the great fleet, having completed the most impressive review that has ever been held in American waters, steamed majestically past them and out to sea.

The New Order in China

THIS generation has witnessed no greater transformation than that which is now taking place in China. It is surely a modern miracle to see an empire of 300,000,000 souls changing, practically in a day, from a despotism to a constitutional government. For over two and a half centuries the Manchus have ruled with increasing corruption, selfishness and injustice. In no country on earth have the people borne with patience so many grievous burdens. Their land has stood still, while other nations were pressing forward to a higher destiny. But the change, long delayed, has come at last. The Manchu rule has gone, and with it that ancient badge of Chinese servitude, the queue, and the old feudal military organizations, and all the clumsy glitter-and-tinsel stage trappings of the Manchu throne. It is a new, progressive China that emerges, after shaking loose from the old rubbishheap—a nation that will soon be in line with modern ideas on all that vitally concerns its social and political life. There may be stormy days ahead, with treacherous attempts by the nobles, who will doubtless plot to restore the disgraced dynasty; but the complete surrender by the throne to the revolutionary demands cannot now be revoked by Manchu cabals. One of the most dangerous possibilities is that an effort may be made by the imperial party to involve the new government with other powers by exciting anti-foreign disturbances. Fortunately, the foreign population has had ample warning.

Dissolving the Steel Corporation

THE announcement that the United States Department of Justice has filed suit against the United States Steel Corporation, aiming to dissolve that mammoth industrial organization, has occasioned widespread speculation over what result the action will have on general business prosperity. The Steel Corporation, now that the Standard Oil Company has been ordered to separate into its integral parts, is the largest industrial corporation in the world. It was incorporated February 25, 1901, with a capitalization of $1,100,000,000, and besides most of the large steel companies of the country, it owns twenty-eight railroads and many mines. It has been stated that the yearly income of these combined companies is greater than the annual income of the United States Government.

Naturally the dissolution of such a gigantic combination cannot be effected without occasioning some disruption in certain national departments of industry. How far this condition may affect the average man of business has already been violently discussed pro and con. At least one fact seems to have been established. If the Sherman act is to be interpreted literally, such combinations are clearly in restraint of trade. This being the case, they are subject to dissolution, and their officials are liable to prosecution.

The fact that such dissolution may affect business in general is beside the law. It has been stated that the effect of such dissolution will be nullified by the ultimate condition which some say is bound to result, i. e., that the dissolution will result in a return to the former condition of violent competition, in the course of which the weaker companies will be forced to the wall, and the strongest company which survives will enjoy a monopoly of the steel trade. We think, however, that the question at issue should be, not the suppression of what is known as big business, but the suppression of the iniquities which may accompany it. Big business can be carried on without the evil of stock jobbing, for instance, and any movement which will eliminate such evil should be welcomed. The whole situation is of importance to the country at large, and the ultimate result will be awaited with interest.

Religious Intolerance in Russia

WHY should Russia exercise the privilege of discriminating, on account of their religion, against American citizens visiting that country with passports, while the United States admits citizens of Russia without question? This was the problem discussed at a notable gathering of Protestant ministers and Jewish rabbis in New York recently. Russia's intolerant and persistent persecution of the Jews is well known. In late years, that government has been even more rigid than usual in its exclusion policy, and not only American Hebrews, but American ministers of various denominations have been subjected to the same unreasonable restrictions it employs toward its own Jewish inhabitants. This course, as the meeting pointed out, is clearly in violation of our treaty with Russia, which was adopted in 1832. The meeting therefore petitioned the President to terminate the treaty, > that Russia may know that a discrimination against any part of our people on religious grounds is contrary to the fundamental principles of our government, and that we cannot admit such a discrimination without being false to American citizenship, which covers the Jew as sacredly as it covers the Christian.

This opens up a very large question. To annul the treaty might have the practical effect of reducing Russian immigration to this country. On the other hand, for our government to send a protest to Russia (as the meeting suggested) might result in a satisfactory modification of the latter's present course with respect to the recognition of passports. But the New York meeting went further and pleaded with the President to intercede with Russia in behalf of the Czar's persecuted subjects, the Stundists, Lutherans, Latins, Baptists, Moravians, and Hebrews included. All of these, and several other sects regarded as heterodox by the Russian State Church, have been sufferers. To plead for them may be regarded by Russia as undue interference with her internal affairs. Although it might be justifiable on the ground of humanity if nothing else, Russia might retaliate by pointing to our negro lynchings, our Chinese exclusion law and our anti-Japanese immigration agitation. We might be asked quite logically why we do not first make our own house clean before troubling others.

The Cost of Armed Peace

FOR a week the big metropolis was dazzled by the imposing spectacle of the most powerful assemblage of warships ever witnessed on this continent. There they lay gracefully riding at anchor on the broad Hudson—a long line of battleships, cruisers, torpedo boats and submarines—over one hundred magnificent engines of destruction. We are a nation at peace with all the world. As a long-distance object-lesson to other governments, and especially to those now engaged in fighting each other, our brilliant naval show on the Hudson, with its salvos to the reviewing President, its electrical illuminations and all the rest of it, may have been extremely effective, although some folk will take occasion to doubt it and to inquire casually the reason for such a demonstration being given at all. It was hardly the kind of prelude suited to a national political campaign. If it was, as we take it, intended as a "peace demonstration," it somewhat overshot the mark, for it had rather a reminiscent flavor of the imperial "triumph" that made a Roman holiday. Americans think the world of our bluejackets—brave, manly fellows, all of them, who would willingly die at their posts, if duty demanded the sacrifice. But while all admire the gallant crews and their officers, and the massive pow of the tremendous naval armament which, togeth with our very moderate-sized army, costs $450,00 000 a year to maintain, we cannot but record t conviction that such a display was liable to be m interpreted both at home and abroad.

If the cost of armed peace reach such an appa ing figure, one hesitates to even roughly appro mate what war would mean to a nation tremendously equipped as ourselves. May God ke our beloved land in peace!

Charles Sumner, one of the greatest Americ statesmen, once summed up the cost of war in single memorable paragraph:

"Give me the money that has been spent in wa he said, "and I will clothe every man, woman a child in an attire of which kings and queens wou be proud. I will build a schoolhouse in every vall over the whole earth. I will crown every hillsi with a place of worship consecrated to the Gospel Peace." At the rate at which we are now buildi battleships and cruisers, Sumner, had he been ali to-day, might very well have added that he cou have done this same thing with the money the nati is now spending on the panoply of war in the "pi ing times of peace."

Little Brown Waifs

SEVERAL years ago, many readers of TH CHRISTIAN HERALD, wishing to be connected in direct way with missionary work, undertook t support of little orphan boys and girls in Indi Many of these children have now grown up to us ful manhood and womanhood. Some are evange ists, others are teachers or Bible women. In fac all who survived have grown up to be an honor ar joy to the good patrons who provided for their ca and training in childhood.

There are some of the youngest orphans, hov ever, who have never had such happiness as the otl ers. They are only partially provided for. W would ask those of our readers who would like t personally share in this most delightful kind of mi sionary work, to help in securing support for thes little ones so that they may have the same trainin and care as the other orphans. If you, dear reade would like to give a small sum monthly or quarterl for this orphan work, kindly drop a postal to TH CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, sig nifying your wish, and it will receive prompt atter tion. The little brown waif who becomes you protégé may yet be a great source of blessing t you.

Italy's Care for Wounded

IT LOOKED for a while as though Italy were going to take possession of Tripoli with comparatively little difficulty. One port and fort after another surrendered with so little resistance, the pleading for mercy upon the part of the Turkish Government was so loud, and the call to the powers of Europe to interfere and close the war was so insistent, that it seemed only a one-sided affair. It was hinted all the time that the Mussulman tribes of North Africa might be aroused to a desperate fanatical contest with its fearful butchery. There is yet a possibility that this may be the case. At the beginning of the war Envers Bey, the Ottoman military attaché at Berlin, left that city for Constantinople. It is said that he passed by camel relay through Egypt, met the Grand Sheikh of the Senussi, and united the whole hinterland in a holy war against the Italian invaders. Envers is such an orthodox Mohammedan that he is counted almost sacred among the tents of the desert. Some new force has entered the field, for there was an engagement the other day in which one thousand natives were killed, with a loss of only 100 to the Italians. But when the Arabs and other tribes get their multitudes together the butchery on both sides is likely to be appalling. Italy has sent to Tripoli a splendidly equipped medical corps. It is under the auspices of the Italian Red Cross, and will care not only for its own wounded, but also for those of the enemy. The best charity would have been to have avoided the cold-blooded war for the acquisition of territory, and left no wounds to dress and no dead to bury; but since the war is on it is well to have the proper medical equipment, and the Red Cross is ready in every part of the world to play the part of the good Samaritan like the one of olden time who Came where he was; and when he saw him, he had compassion on him, and went to him, and bound up his wounds, pouring in oil and wine, and set him on his own beast, and brought him to an inn, and took care of him. (Luke 10:33, 34.)

An Italian Medical Corps Disembarking at Tripoli

Mobbed Fake Explorer

Dr. Frederick A. Cook emerged from the oblivion that followed his deep-dyed disgrace in a lecture tour which he made recently through some of the principal cities of Europe. The first lecture was given in Copenhagen, where, when he first claimed the discovery of the North Pole, he had been crowned with vines and blossoms as the chief explorer of the world. The effrontery that, after the complete exposure of his fraud, would take him back to Copenhagen on this errand, is almost beyond conception. Most of the audience hissed and mocked him as he proceeded with his lecture and stereopticon views. But when he threw on the canvas a picture of the North Pole, the crowd rushed on him, and he left the hall abruptly by a back door, and was escorted to his hotel under a guard of policemen, who were not able to protect him from a shower of stale eggs. Dr. Cook offered to donate the proceeds of his lecture to the Cape York Eskimos, but the latest report is that the missionaries have refused to receive what they regard as ill-gotten gains. Dr. Cook had already been proven to be one of the monumental frauds of the century, and it was cruelty to himself as well as an insult to the public, to undertake another chapter of deceit. Repugnance felt toward the liar is thus voiced:

He that worketh deceit shall not dwell within my house; he that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight. (Ps. 101:7.)

Snake Threatens Life

E. W. Copley of Dallas, Texas, had a snake sixteen feet long, weighing 250 pounds, recently imported from India, and was exhibiting it in a museum there. He took the reptile over to Oak Cliff, a suburb, to give him an airing and to feed him. The first course of five little chickens the snake swallowed whole; five eggs constituted the second course. Thinking the creature was drowsy and would be quiet, Copley and his assistants undertook to carry it away on a blanket. The assistant stumbled and dropped his end of the blanket. The snake instantly wrapped himself around Copley's legs and was preparing to throw his coils around the man's body when Copley seized the reptile's head above the jaws, snapped it suddenly backward and broke the neck. In a moment more the boa constrictor would have crushed the man to death. In the earliest beginnings God promised this destruction of the serpent's sin by the Son of man.

And I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel. (Gen. 3:15.)

Died Saving Grandchild

The Rev. N. S. Goodwin, eighty years of age, a retired clergyman at Niagara Falls, Ont., lost his life the other day, but saved his granddaughter from being ground under the wheels of a Michigan Central Railroad train. The aged man had left his son's home with the little girl for an airing. She was in a go-cart and he was pushing it and talking and laughing with his little darling. Crossing the street with the railroad tracks, he did not notice the swift express train until it was almost upon them. He gave the baby carriage a hard push, which barely cleared the track, but he could not get out of the way himself in time, and the locomotive killed him. Could anything be more pathetic than this aged man of God, who had spent a lifetime preaching vicarious sacrifice as the central thought of his Bible and theology, surrendering his life in the saving of the life of the precious little child? He could have saved himself, but he preferred to save her. The apostle refers to vicarious sacrifice in these words:

Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us: and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren. (I. John 3:16.)

Stole for Charity's Sake

Richard Pasharz pleaded guilty to the charge of stealing $6,000 from his employers, Harris Brothers and Barnett, of Broadway, New York, and Judge Swann paroled him. Most of the money stolen was given to various charitable institutions and calls. Five thousand dollars was given by him at one time to the German Odd Fellows' Home of Mamaroneck, N. Y. The misfortune, however, was that his charity was not genuine, for he only gave to gain popularity, to be considered by the community as a very generous man. In his confession to the judge he said: "My trouble is due to a mad desire for fraternal honors. It was the great desire of my life to obtain high rank in my lodge, so I stole money to make donations and give parties and picnics to old people and children. I ask no mercy for myself, but I pray that you will consider my broken-hearted wife." This is not the only man who has been generous with means taken wrongfully from others, nor the only one who has given to be seen of men. The hopeful features of the incident, which make it especially worthy of record, is that the man was deeply penitent and spent the whole of the Jewish Day of Atonement in confession, in sorrow and in agonizing prayer to God for forgiveness, and that his former employers forgave him and restored him to the place of confidential bookkeeper which he had held for eight years. These employers, in their forgiveness of and confidence in the offender, did what Christ would have done, but which business men seldom do. If God gave men no more mercy than they give to each other, there would be little hope for any. Even the paradoxical sin of stealing to give away, when repentance and restitution follow, is freely forgiven by a merciful Lord and by kind-hearted fellowmen. Whatever be the sin or whoever be the sinner, we have the assurance that If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. (I. John 1:9.)

Life Saved from Massacre

Miss Jessie Smith, her father, mother, and two brothers, were attacked by an anti-Semitic mob in the streets of Odessa. All were killed but herself and she was stabbed and left on the ground for dead. She dragged herself out of the glare of the burning houses, and crept to one of the hospitals, where the surgeons pronounced her wounds fatal, but tenderly nursed her back to life. While in the hospital this Jewish orphan of seventeen years determined that she would become a nurse and pay back some little part of the debt she owed to humanity. The following year she managed to cross the border of Russia into Germany, and to make her way to New York. She graduated as a trained nurse at the Har Moriah Hospital in New York the other day. In honor of her achievement, and in view of the pathetic circumstances that led her into this life work, the directors of the training school gave a banquet in her honor at the hospital. A woman of her ability, courage and devotion will be an untold blessing to society. Paul refers to the sparing of life for special service to humanity in these words:

Because for the work of Christ he was nigh unto death, not regarding his life, to supply your lack of service toward me. (Phil. 2:30.)

Blind Pupils in Fire

The clang of fire engines on Rivington Street, New York, would have caused a panic among the pupils of Public School No. 20, just across the street, had it not been for the splendid discipline preserved by the fire-drill exercise. The ten blind pupils, each boy taking the hand of a girl, were given the right of way, and like little soldiers they marched at the head of the line, and 3,000 scholars filed after them out of the doors to the street and safety. What a glorious system of public schools we have in this country, and what steady improvement there is made in methods for the physical protection, intellectual development, and moral culture of the pupils! Ordinarily the blind leaders of the blind fall together into the ditch. The blind children had so learned the halls and stairways, in their daily attendance and in the fire drill, that they were not only able to lead the blind scholars, but also the 3,000 who could see, to safety. In the escape of children and grown people from physical and spiritual conflagrations, it would be well to heed the cry:

Escape for thy life; look not behind thee. (Gen 19:17.)

Brander Cushing's Ambition

A New Serial Story Written for The Christian Herald

By Charles M. Sheldon.

Author of "In His Steps"

Synopsis of Preceding Chapter

The story opens with a vivid description of the brilliant scene at the launching of the new American battleship Republic, 26,000 tons displacement, at the great navy yard at Dockville. The Secretary of War is present with many other high officials, members of Congress, army and navy officers. The great steel monster of destruction, the most perfect triumph of modern shipbuilding, is the work of Brander Cushing, the famous builder and naval contractor, who is present, with his son Sidney, on the launching platform. The signal is given, the music strikes up and the huge vessel is "christened" in the usual manner by Miss Pax Marston, the beautiful daughter of Rear-Admiral Marston. A tiny bow of ribbons, which was released by the impact of the stroke at the moment the conventional bottle broke on the vessel's bow, flutters past the high launching platform. Several snatch at it, but only one, Sidney Cushing, succeeds in grasping the little bunch of color, though he does so at the risk of losing his balance and dropping a sheer seventy-five feet to the river below. A dozen spectators, seeing his peril, spring to his assistance, but he recovers his poise, although his hat, caught by the wind, is wafted away.

After this adventure, he is introduced to Miss Pax, the Admiral's daughter, who has been an interested witness of his exploit. She questions him about his rescue of a young sailor on the cruiser Del Monte a year before, and although young Cushing modestly evades a direct answer, she is satisfied that the heroic act was his. The Admiral invites him to call upon them in Washington. Leaving the launching platform, he is proceeding up town to buy a hat to replace his lost one, when a sudden explosion occurs near at hand in the big naval supplies factory of which his father is the principal owner. The whole building seems to burst into flame. Cushing, seeing numbers of women leaping from the windows, at the risk of his life succeeds in saving a number of workers from the burning factory. A busy reporter whom he encounters at the fire, after he has come out blackened and scorched from the smoking ruin, tells him that two of the girls he has rescued are daughters of an old, invalided navy yard employee named Howard. He is horror-stricken at the terrible tragedy he has witnessed and stunned by the reflection that his own father is responsible for the lack of fire-escapes, which he had been notified by the fire marshal two months ago to provide, but had neglected. He goes back, half-dazed, to his father's office. The latter is greatly excited when he learns that over one hundred lives have been sacrificed through his neglect of a plain duty. The question of this responsibility is discussed between them. The son tells his father plainly that he remembers the marshal's notification. "Somebody is guilty of the death of those girls," he says. "Who is it?" And Brander Cushing knows that a great breach—the first in his lifetime—has come between him and his son.

Chapter II

"I TAKE all the blame, Sidney. You're not the Company, not yet."

"Have you thought what it means? O God! Father, if you had seen what I saw an hour ago—"

Brander Cushing's hand trembled as he put it up to his mouth and he could not conceal his agitation by the strongest effort.

"I don't attempt to excuse myself, Sid. The marshal's notice—I was head over heels in the launching—I hadn't meant to put off attending to the fire escapes—see here! I made a note here and called Johnson's attention to the matter, advising him to order the stuff and have it put through—where is it? Here." He turned to his files, found the memorandum and held it out towards Sidney.

Sidney paid no attention to it.

"Have you thought what may come of this, father?"

"Of course not. I have not—"

"The county attorney may bring suit."

Brander Cushing's face paled.

"I think not."

"He is your political enemy."

"I can see to that."

"But oh, father, it isn't that—it's—"

"What?"

"The crime of not obeying the law—"

"Do you charge your father with crime?"

"I don't know what I do, father—"

There was silence in the office room. Brander Cushing looked at his son and his face grew very hard.

"The only witness to the serving of the notice by the marshal was yourself."

"And yourself." Sidney said it in all simplicity. No suspicion of what might come.

His father turned and carefully filed away the papers in the office safe. Then he faced his son with another look.

"I'm going down to the scene of the fire. There will be time to get over to the city for the banquet."

"Banquet!"

"Yes. They will not sit down before nine thirty."

"The minute Brander Cushing began, people who had risen to go out sat down again"

"I can't go, father."

"Can't go! Why not?"

"Father! After all that—"

"Well, what can you do now?" A pause. "I feel as bad about it as you do. But the banquet is too important to miss. I must go. And I want you to be there. I'll go home from the—the fire, and meet you there."

He went out, and after he was gone, Sidney sat down and thought. His mind kept going over and over the scene at the factory. Always those bodies falling, falling—would that picture never fade out of his memory?"

He went home and dressed for the banquet, and then sat down to wait for his father.

Brander Cushing was a widower, and Sidney was an only son. They lived in a comfortable old house maintained by a housekeeper, a butler and a man servant. Unlike nearly every one of his business acquaintances, Brander Cushing had a scorn for automobiles and did not even keep a horse. He had been a great athlete in his younger days and often told his friends that the new modern riding machines were bound to destroy the stamina, endurance and manhood of youth. What exercise did the modern business man or even young man have nowadays? He ate his breakfast, rushed into a car which half the time a hired hand drove, got into an elevator, sat down to his desk, dictated letters, walked around the nearest corner for a fifteen-minute lunch, back to his money-making for four hours more, and then another ride home in a car and possibly a mild golf game two or three times a week; but no red-blooded exercise worth talking about, and no real walking or running to keep the physical man up to the mark—a rapidly growing, flabby, degenerate, soft-muscled, sloppy race that couldn't sit up straight, hit a hard blow, or walk half a mile without puffing. So he held to his five-mile walk every morning, and Sidney, who had followed his father's steps in athletics, did not question the methods of his father even when the remarkable absence of automobile and carriage brought him into some embarrassing situations. He had accepted it all as he had always accepted his father's positive life programme, and had rather enjoyed the reputation for queerness and distinctiveness it gained for the family name.

Brander Cushing found Sidney ready dressed, sitting in the library.

"It was a horrible affair, Sid."

"Yes."

"Over a hundred girls dead."

Silence.

"The factory a heap of ruin."

The boy sat there in his evening clothes, mute and pale.

"There will be a strict investigation."

Silence.

"A horrible affair. And you saved—how many?"

"I don't know."

"On a narrow board—crossing over on it?"

"Yes."

"I found out about the Howards. Theodore Howard is the name of the blind paralytic. His daughter's name is Hermosa."

"Hermosa?"

"Yes. The crippled girl you spoke of rooms next to them. Her name is Athanasia."

"Athanasia?"

"Yes. I remembered it because it is so queer."

Silence.

"I feel almost as you do, Sid. I've no heart for the banquet."

"Let's not go!"

"No. We must go. I must stand in with the old Vets. Besides, Sid, I'm down on the programme, you know, to respond to the toast of 'The Builder.'"

He passed into the dining-room.

"Better have a cup of tea before we go."

"No, father, I don't care for it."

"Very well. I'll be ready in a few minutes."

Father and son came out of the house half an hour later and walked down to the ferry station a mile distant.

More than one person, meeting them, paused, stopped, turned, looked, and said, "A fine pair! What a stride!" and then with a pleased smile went on, dwelling over the memory of the handsome father and son as they looked on that September evening.

The banquet was late, as most banquets are. It was brilliant, as a navy banquet is apt to be. By brilliant we mean, there was an elegantly appointed hall. A distinguished company of men and women facing a distinguished looking menu composed of some of the most expensive luxuries called food. Seven different kinds of drink, most of it intoxicating. Hundreds of thousands of dollars in the shape of costly gems worn by old and young women. Hundreds of "our country's flag, sir!" festooning walls, tables and ceiling. Rare orchids, out-of-season tropical fruits, gorgeous displays of cut glass, and individual favors at each plate of a silver battleship. Above all, the presence of the Secretary of War and most of the President's cabinet, members of the Supreme Court, ambassadors, admirals, sea captains, retired officers, Senators, newspaper men, multimillionaires, business men, speculators, money kings, every one but the common people who make navies and armies possible.

Just before the secretary rose to speak, there was a miniature launching of the new battleship, the Republic. A curtain was withdrawn from the end of the speaker's table and the scene of the shipyard was re-enacted, even to the breaking of a tiny bottle over the bow of the ship by an automaton. All cheered as the model, which cost $500 to make, glided down into a real pool of water and stopped by clockwork directly in front of the secretary, and the banquet committee smiled complacently in anticipation of having pulled off the finest stunt of

HARVESTING THE WORLD'S WHEAT

Modern Harvesting Machinery Reaping and Binding in a Great Tract of Wheat Land

By JOHN L. COWAN

WHATEVER hopes any one may have entertained of a lower cost of living for many months to come were shattered by the final crop report for 1911, which indicates a shortage in the wheat crop, as compared with 1910, of nearly 70,000,000 bushels. Combined with a falling off in the corn crop of 390,000,000 bushels, in the oat crop of 284,000,000 bushels, in the potato crop of 79,000,000 bushels, and similar deficiencies in barley, hay, rice and buckwheat, it must be admitted that the outlook for moderate food prices for Uncle Sam's large and usually prosperous family is not encouraging.

The wheat acreage in the United States for the harvest of 1911 was 52,125,000 acres, producing a crop of 656,762,400 bushels. The acreage harvested in 1910 was only 49,205,000 acres, but the yield was 695,443,000 bushels. The largest wheat crop the world ever harvested was that of 1909, amounting to 3,624,000,000 bushels, gathered from 235,000,000 acres of land.

No other country produces so much wheat as the United States, which harvests approximately one-fifth of all the wheat grown in the world. Within recent years, Canada has taken a commanding position among wheat-producing nations, its relatively small population leaving much of its crop for export. Forty years ago, the entire country produced less than 17,000,000 bushels annually. Ten years ago the crop had risen to more than 55,000,000 bushels. Since then, the great migration from the United States and the British Isles has taken place, and the history of the development of our own prairie States is being duplicated in Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan. Europe produces about two and one-half times as much wheat as North America, largely on the black plain of Central and Southern Russia, the plain that slopes to the North and Baltic Seas, and the plains of Hungary and Lombardy. Russia, Austria-Hungary and the countries along the lower Danube produce more wheat than they consume, and are important exporting regions. France grows about enough to supply the wants of her own people. Belgium, Holland, Germany, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Spain, Italy and Greece are buyers, requiring from 400,000,000 to 500,000,000 bushels annually in excess of their production. Great Britain does not grow one-fourth enough wheat to supply bread for her people, and (with Ireland) buys approximately 200,000,000 bushels annually, being the world's greatest wheat-buyer.

Somewhere the wheat harvest is always in progress. Asia produces about four-fifths as much wheat as North America, the greater part of its crop coming from India and Asiatic Russia. Northern China is a wheat-producer, as also is Southern Siberia, which may hereafter become one of the world's greatest wheat-growing regions. South America produces less than one-fourth as much wheat as North America, largely in Argentina; but the small population of that country leaves a large surplus for export. Australia and Africa together produce about as much as South America, but have vast areas of land, now unutilized, that may be adapted to wheat-growing.

There are more people living in the world to-day who depend upon rice than upon wheat for subsistence; and a greater number of the human family live upon millet than upon any other cereal.

But wheat has always been the preferred food crop of the races of the highest civilization. The progressive nations have always been wheat-eaters. If cultivation were to cease for only a few years, the plant would utterly disappear. There are wild varieties of rye, barley and oats, but not of wheat. It appears to have developed from some plant now unknown. The most primitive of all existing types of wheat is that known as emmer, and all the hundreds of existing varieties have developed from this. Grains of emmer have been found in Egyptian tombs of the first dynasty, dating back 4,000 years before the Christian era. Bread of wheat has been excavated from the ruins of the prehistoric lake dwellings of Wanger and Robenhausen, in Switzerland. It is interesting to know that the first wheat ever grown in the New World came from seed accidentally brought with rice from Spain to Mexico, and found and planted by a negro slave belonging to Cortez. Baron Humboldt relates having seen in the city of Quito an earthen vase in which a French monk had brought from Ghent the first wheat planted in South America.

Wheat grains vary greatly in size. Some varieties produce grains so small that 24,000 are required to weigh a pound. Other varieties yield grains 8,000 of which weigh a pound. In color there is as great a variation, from nearly white, through many shades of yellow, to a reddish hue. Some varieties are known as winter wheats. These are sown in the fall, and the plants come up before the weather gets cold, then remaining dormant all winter. They have most of their growth in the spring and early summer, ripening in midsummer. Spring wheats are planted in the spring, and ripen the same season. Spring wheat used to be considered inferior to winter wheat, but improved milling methods now make it possible to obtain just as good flour from one kind as from the other.

In 1893, the United States Department of Agriculture made a collection of more than 1,000 supposedly different varieties of wheat, secured from all parts of the world. Investigation showed that many of these varieties were identical, or nearly so. Nevertheless, about 250 distinct varieties were found that were considered of possible value to American agriculturists.

Wright Soars in His New "Glider"

Carrying the Glider Up Kill Devil Hill for a Fresh Start

Orville Wright and Alexander Ogilvie Working on the Machine

Wilbur Wright Riding Stationary in a Fifty-Mile Gale

THE accompanying photographs by Mr. P. Trenchard Jones, of Philadelphia, were snapped, by permission of Orville Wright, on the day he succeeded in keeping a motorless airship on an even keel in a gale of wind, in his attempts to solve the secret of the bird's flight. The photographs mark a new and important development in aviation. The desolate place selected for these experiments is the same spot on which they camped when making their first airship experiments, some ten years ago. Kitty Hawk is on a sandy waste on the coast of North Carolina. Some of the pictures were made with the wind blowing a gale. The "glider" was held perfectly still, heading directly into the wind. Orville Wright has made a study of the power of the birds to fly in the teeth of a gale, and his "glider" is constructed in accordance with the knowledge he has gained by close observation of the movements of a bird in soaring. "It is only a question of time," Wright says, "when the motorless aeroplane will be an accomplished fact." This he predicts is the next important step forward in aviation, and although he will not talk about his own experiments, he is confident that he will be able to show that man can soar aloft like a bird and remain there with perfect safety, without the assistance of a motor. These photographs were the only ones made of the last and most successful trial of the "glider" at Kitty Hawk.

In an article in the New York Tribune, R. J. Beamish thus describes the Wright "glider":

"First, the frame of the glider is, in its essentials, the same as that of the usual Wright biplane. The specially prepared canvas wings are stretched upon a stout but light series of spars and struts. All parts of the wings, and particularly the tips, are under the control of the operator through heavy, tested copper wires. This is the wing-warping device of the Wrights carried out to perfection. Their aeroplanes have it, but not with the delicate responsiveness that is shown in the new glider.

"Jutting from the front of the glider is a long, stout pole like the bowsprit of a ship. At its end is a bag of sand weighing about eight pounds. The pole corresponds to the neck of a soaring bird like the stork, and the bag of sand to the head of the bird. The combination of pole and bag acts as balance to the new rudder.

"It is the rudder that attracts greatest attentic This is in two parts, a vertical, canvas-clad pla that rises about two feet higher than the top of t glider and a horizontal plane of equal length th may be lifted or depressed like a bird's tail. T vertical rudder swings right or left in instant ob dience to the movement of the aviator's body a the horizontal plane is raised or lowered by a leve Corresponding to the vertical rudder is a ne aileron or wing that is beside the operator and up his left. By shifting this to right or left he enabled to tack at any angle into the wind, to ru with it or to stand absolutely still. Completing t glider is a pair of light, springy skids from whic the contrivance is launched and upon which alights when perfectly flown."

After the latest trials at Kitty Hawk, Orvil Wright said: "It only remains to develop the flyin instinct that is dormant in every person. That the purpose of this glider. Then every one can fl It will be like walking or swimming."

China Yields to the Revolution always been opposed to the corrupt administration. He would open to able men those avenues to official preferment which have been closed by Prince Ching. Thus, the first consequence of the elimination of the Manchu régime will be a genuine administration, mainly composed of the Chinese element.

But, after all, the future of China really depends on its acceptance or rejection of Christianity. How will this be affected by the coming of the republic? Those who are best able to form an opinion would, I have reason to believe, with one voice declare that a popular native government would veer toward a very favorable attitude with regard to the Christian churches and the missions with which the whole empire is dotted. What has been the main cause of the popular hatred of foreigners generally, including the missionaries? Simply the delusion that they upheld the Manchu dynasty. The revolutionary leaders know better now, and hence they have loudly proclaimed a policy of absolute toleration.

Of the 800 Chinese students now in America, some being young women, fully half are Christians. This is also the case with many of the young Chinamen who are studying, chiefly at the various technical colleges, in England. And those even who are not Christians go back to China imbued with progressive ideas. The great China Inland Mission, founded by the late Hudson Taylor, has woven a network of stations, with nearly two thousand agents of both sexes, throughout the country, and the different American and British missions employ a still larger number.

American influence would be China's best help under the new régime. Returned students are already directing trade in China increasingly alon American channels. Some of these young men ar in important commercial positions, and what the are doing indicates what will develop under favo able future conditions. In the very district whe the rebellion has its headquarters, the output of th Hanyang Iron Mills, 600 miles up the Yangtse fro Shanghai, and thus only about 100 miles from Han kow, is being shippe through the Suez Cana landed in Brooklyn, an sold at an advantage i competition with Pitts burg. Under a liberal ré gime, an immense impuls will be given to minin industries, and the incal culable underground treas ures of China will be con verted into cash to alle viate the massive poverty of the people.

THE "SACRED BULL" OF KALI

By MRS. R. WINSOR, Sirur, India

WHEN I came to Sirur, I went in terror of my life, with one of these so-called "sacred" animals that frequently came into our yard. The servants were afraid to drive it away, because of its "sacredness."

The Goddess Kali, from a Native Print

This particular Pol is a "sacred" bull buffalo. The Hindus, as your readers no doubt are aware, have a number of gods and goddesses who they believe must be propitiated in various ways. One of these is Kali, the goddess of evil. When a village is visited by a scourge or pestilence—famine, cholera, or plague—these foolish people put it down to the wrath of Kali, the goddess, being visited upon them, for not having offered her some suitable gift. In one village, where the inhabitants thought the goddess was especially enraged against them, and had caused evils to come upon them, they let loose twenty of these sacred animals, with a view to propitiating the goddess. If they wish to commit a crime, or do any evil, they go to her for a blessing on their dark deeds.

A few years ago, when the villages of Tudbachiadi and Golagao were visited by cholera, this Pol I am writing you about was dedicated to Kali and allowed to wander at his own sweet will uncontrolled. Wherever he went, or whatever he did, was supposed to be at the instigation of the goddess. The people of both villages were afraid to lay hands on him, for fear of calling down upon themselves and their progeny the vengeance of Kali. Pol grew fiercer each day, and was a terror to both villages and all the people living around. He was allowed (as these Pols usually are) to do just as he liked. The fields and cattle were destroyed; men, women, and children hurt or wounded, and all sorts of depredations were committed for which Pol was accountable.

The subjection of this Pol was swift and complete.

At Golagao there is a forest which has splendid grazing for cattle. All these years it has been under the control of a rich Hindu, and Pol was allowed free access to the place, and did just as he pleased. If he fought with or injured the cattle or any person, no one dared to interfere, because of his "sacredness." But the Hindu having failed to renew his lease of the forest, it has been rented this year by a Christian gentleman, who has put his cattle there, fenced them in with barbed wire, and built comfortable sheds for man and beast. When Pol wandered round in his usual way to the grazing grounds, he found there was a barrier to his entering, where heretofore he had been "monarch of all he surveyed." Besides, he saw a nice young bull buffalo whom he would like to fight, and if not kill, at least injure in some way. So, although the barrier was strong and the sharp points hurt; yet he who had so long been master and would be so still, cared not for the tearing of his flesh, but thrust through, fought with, and hurt the young bull buffalo that had usurped his rights. So afraid are these unfortunate people of the "sacred" animals that not one of the keepers would dare to drive him out of the enclosure, but sent to the owner to come to their rescue. When the owner went down, he was confronted by this savage beast whom all were afraid to approach.

Pol, the Sacred Bull of Kali

Pol, when he saw the gentleman armed with a pistol, made good his escape, and although the police were ordered to impound the animal, they were afraid to do so because of Kali's wrath. That same night, Pol revisited the enclosure. The keepers of the cattle being asleep, Pol's entrance was unobserved; so when, through the rubbing of his horns and body against the sheds, the people were awakened and felt the building swaying and shaking, they took it for some terrible punishment that had been sent by Kali. They made a mad rush and climbed the trees to escape from Pol. One man, as soon as the furious animal's attention had been diverted from him for a little while, ran all the way from Golagao, two miles, to the gentleman's house, woke him up and asked him to come and help them. The owner went down and insisted on the animal being caught and controlled. Now Pol has been chained. In spite of all, these people will not let the beast remain in captivity, but intend taking him away 125 miles from Golagao, to turn him loose in a jungle, where he no doubt will fall a prey to some wild animal.

The following letter, written by a native fairly educated, shows with what veneration these animals are still regarded by the superstitious people:

RESPECTED SIR: Your letter about Pol is being forwarded to the Mamlatdar in his camp. His orders are awaited. In the meanwhile, village Patil of Golagao is sent for with leading villagers. On their arrival their statements will be taken, and if they are willing to take care of the bull, it will be handed over in their charge, after taking a security in writing. If they are not willing, the bull will have to be shooted, with the permission of the District Magistrate, as none would dare take it in auction if made. Meanwhile it may be sent to the cattle pound of Sirur or Golagao, as will be convenient. I think, however, it may be allowed to remain in the place where it is kept now, as it seems dangerous to remove the bull into a cattle pound, though it is not allowed by law to keep the animal in your charge. The feeding of the bull can be made by Police Patil of the village. Police Patil of Sirur is being ordered to look to the management. Yours obediently,

E. SAHASRABUDHYE,
Head Karkoon (Clerk).

The Mother of American Methodism

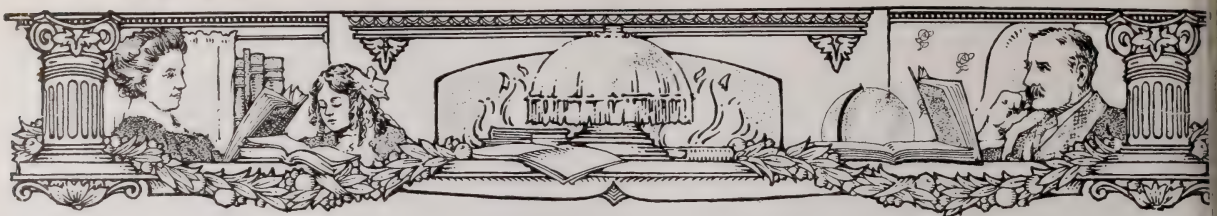
such as would be saved." A third person whose name figures largely in this early history of the John Street Church was Captain Thomas Webb, a British army officer. The little company was assembled for worship one day, when a stranger in full military costume appeared. All eyes were upon him, and anxious questions arose in every heart. The Methodists had been relentlessly persecuted and prevented from holding public worship in many parts of the old country, and they now feared lest a similar fate was to overtake the infant church in America. The stranger stayed, however, and by the earnestness with which he joined in the worship quieted the fears of the congregation. After the service he introduced himself as "Captain Thomas Webb, of Albany, a soldier of the cross and a spiritual son of John Wesley." The coming of such a man into their midst at that critical time was a source of great joy to the members of the church. In addition to the moral support which Captain Webb was able to give during that time, when Methodism was denounced nearly everywhere and was made the subject of ribald songs in the streets and public-houses, he was personally a man of great popularity, hearty, earnest, and of proven courage. He had served at the siege of Louisburg and with General Wolfe had scaled the Heights at Quebec in that struggle which ended French rule in America.

As was the custom of the time, when Captain Webb preached—for he had been appointed a local preacher—he appeared in the pulpit in military full dress and was in the habit of removing his sword and placing it upon the pulpit beside the Bible. Even in those days this was a little spectacular, and sheer curiosity drew many persons to the Methodist services. There were many cases where "those who came to scoff remained to pray," and the society grew until a still larger meeting-place became necessary. It was then that a rigging loft on Horse and Cart Street, which is now called William Street, was rented. During the time that this bare room was used as the place of assembly, the church still grew in numbers, and as it in turn became crowded, Barbara Heck again came to the fore and declared that a plan for building a church had been revealed to her as the result of earnest prayer, and it was at her urging that the first Methodist church building in America was erected. A subscription paper was started, and Captain Webb's name heads the list with thirty pounds, which was then a very large gift.

Such famous names as Barclay, Delancy, Cortland, Duane, and many others are found amongst those of the more humble who gave for this first building. With the money obtained lots were leased in a plot of ground on Golden Hill, which was commonly called "Shoemaker's Ground." On this property there was a small Dutch-built house which was afterward used as the parsonage. The little church, when it was completed, was a very plain and unpretentious affair, but represented the most strenuous efforts on the part of the society's membership. Having no bishop or high church official to assist in the dedication, which was held in October, 1768, the privilege of conducting the services fell to Philip Embury, who, from a pulpit made by his own hands and which is still preserved, preached the dedicatory sermon from the text, "Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy; break up your fallow ground, for it is time to seek the Lord, till he come and rain righteousness upon you."

The history of the other places of meeting repeated itself in this new home of the organization, so that the original congregation of five increased to more than a thousand and sometimes filled the yard in front of the church, to which the name Wesley Chapel had been given. It was seen that Philip Embury needed assistance in the pastorate, so in response to an urgent appeal Wesley sent Richard Boardman and Joseph Pilmoor to America. Previous to their arrival, however, Robert Williams came to New York from England and at once entered upon service in the John Street Church. So starts the long list of names, which contains many that are known to the Methodist world not only of America but of Europe. In November, three years after the opening of Wesley Chapel, Francis Asbury preached his first sermon there as pastor. Like Wesley, Asbury was possessed of great strength and firmness of character and he was singularly useful in the founding of American Methodism.



During the times of uncertainty and change which characterized the Revolutionary War the John Street Church was especially fortunate in that it was preserved from the destruction or desecration which fell to practically all the church buildings of other denominations. This was probably due to the fact that the Hessians occupied it on Sunday mornings for services conducted by their own chaplains, leaving it to its rightful owners at night and all such other times as they desired. At the Christmas Conference of 1784, John Dickens, a former pastor of the John Street Church, proposed the name of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which was duly accepted and made permanent. Five years later John Dickens, with a borrowed capital of $600, became Book Steward of the denomination and launched the first Methodist Book Concern. At the present time, the Methodist Book Concerns have accumulated a capital of nearly $4,000,000, have distributed nearly $5,000,000 in dividends and have produced and circulated publications exceeding in value $75,000,000.

In 1817 Wesley Chapel was demolished to make room for a larger building, and a year later a splendid new edifice was dedicated. The names of many of the denomination's most famous men are associated with that building. On the day of its dedication, Nathan Bangs, Samuel Merwin and Joseph Soule preached. John Summerfield preached his first sermon in America in that building; and so one might continue through a long list of famous pastors. In 1840 John Street was widened to accommodate increasing traffic, for the residential district had now moved many blocks above this locality, so it became necessary to tear down the old church. The following year, however, the present church was erected, and on April 27, 1841, Bishop Hedding preached the dedicatory from the text, "For from you sounded out the Word of the Lord."

Through the last seventy years old No. 44 John Street has been adapting itself to changes, which have left it marooned miles away from the present residential districts of the city and in a section where the type of its activities demanded change, that they might fulfil their commission of usefulness. To retain its grasp upon those to whom its ministries are possible the church has become more and more missionary in its activities. The church building is open every day of the year and its noon-day businessmen's prayer-meeting is very widely known and is attended by large crowds every day. The church has recently established a rescue mission, known as the Wesley Rescue Hall, and continually works in the closest relations with the Water Street Mission. The regular departments of church activity, such as Sunday School, Epworth League and various organizations for the younger members, are supported even against the odds which confront such work in a district so far away from the real homes of the people.

THEODORE RAND-MCNALLY.

AROUND THE HOME HEARTH

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

A Brave Protest

EX-PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT, in his customary blunt and decisive mode of speech, uttered the other day a warning against a sin that is to be laid at the door, not of war, but of peace. There are terrible evils that stalk in the path of war. The bloodshed on fields of battle, the sick and wounded in hospitals, the crippled soldiers who come home, and the widows and orphans who survive after the arbitration of the sword and the rifle, sufficiently exploit the horrors of war. Peace with her lily must answer for the shame of one terrific sin allowed by her and shamelessly permitted without a protest in many sections of the land. Child labor is an infamy of peace, or, shall we say, a blot on the escutcheon of commerce? There are mill-towns in New England and the South where children of tender years, with wizened faces and claw-like hands and dwarfed limbs, toil from morning until night. The mother who tucks her rosy babe into his crib at night, who gathers a little band of cherubs about her and hears them say their prayers and takes a look at them, rosy and dimpled and sweet—children who have plenty of play and fresh air and good food—should spare a thought for the little slaves who, North and South, are robbed of their birthright.

Mr. Roosevelt made a vigorous plea for the enforcement of legal restrictions against the labor of children. Think of it, mothers who read this page. You need not go to the mills or the mines, or farther than our tenements in the larger cities, to find children, scarcely past babyhood, bearing burdens that would tax men and women. A child of five is forced to look after younger children or to sit beside her mother or her pallid father, pulling out basting threads or sewing on buttons or doing some other task that childish fingers should not attempt. Here, too, every one should lend a hand in bringing about a reform. One thing we may do, and we need not postpone it. We may refuse to buy or wear articles of clothing that obviously have been put together at the cost of some other woman's weariness and the peril of her life.

Child labor will cease when it is not only prohibited by law, but made impracticable by the great numbers of kind-hearted people who shall refuse to permit its continuance beneath our flag.

Saturday Night and Sunday Morning

ALL keeping of the Lord's Day involving gloom, fretfulness, and ill-temper is as much an infraction of the Sabbath rest as the undertaking of toil during its sacred hours. When people rise later on Sunday than on other days, when breakfast is a scramble and the preparation for church is so hurried and tumultuous that the family are tired before they leave the house, and so reach the pew in a disturbed state of mind, something is wrong.

In the day before yesterday, by which is meant the days when the grandmothers were girls, Saturday night made beautiful Sunday morning. In Christian homes the rule was to remove every trace of secular books and newspapers from the living-room on Saturday afternoon. To lay out the clothing for the next day, to see that gloves were mended, shoes polished and Sunday School lessons learned by the children was part of the routine. However busy the mother might be she did not forget to remind the boys and girls that tomorrow would be the best day of the week, that they must read over the Sunday School lesson and commit to memory the required verses. In many households, most of the cooking for the Sabbath was done on Saturday so that all that was needful was to make tea and coffee or prepare vegetables at the cost of very little labor, to accompany the cold roast. Pies, cakes and puddings were baked on Saturday.

A return to the old ways might help us to greater enjoyment of Sunday than is possible when Saturday is taken up with visiting or sight-seeing.

Hindrances in Housekeeping

THE Home Economic Pure Food and Art Department of the New Jersey State Federation of Woman's Clubs recently held an all-day meeting in a country place for the purpose of discussing practical questions. As I write the opening sentence I am impressed with the great change in feeling that has come to pass since first a Woman's Club was organized in this land. To conservative people the innovation presaged disaster. In the ranks of Woman's Clubs to-day the conservatives are in the majority, and the Woman's Club in city, town, village and farmstead stands for the dignity and wellbeing of the average home. Here are a few of the questions presented to the ladies on the occasion of their June session: "What is your most serious problem?" "On what basis have you built best results, ideal and practical?" "What do you consider the most important problem to be solved in the home?" "Toward what end does your greatest effort tend?"

The answers to these questions were varied, but conspicuous among them and overshadowing the rest was the difficulty of obtaining adequate domestic help. This problem bristles with trials to the ordinary housekeeper. In the first place, the material from which we can draw women to assist us in the kitchen must, as a rule, be taken in the raw and then refined and shaped to the individual need. The women who accept housework are naturally young and have the same social requirements that our daughters have. They suffer, far more than most employers suppose, from loneliness. Many good women frown upon love and lovemaking in the kitchen, and the housemaid is obliged to meet her young man surreptitiously or see him only when she has her afternoon out. Young women of the class who in these days accept domestic service are untrained and have to be taught the simplest details of cooking, sweeping and managing. This being the case, they still demand very high wages. MILKING TIME

Come home, good Bossie, the children wait
For supper and bed, till I give you back.
You have wandered far, and the evening star

Good Times in the Cozy Corner

EAR COZY CORNER BOYS AND GIRLS: Oh, if you could only see the heaps of letters here on desk in the busy editorial offices of CHRISTIAN HERALD, from boys' girls' clubs of all kinds, the mem- of which are writing for plans suggestions that will make their tings practical and interesting.

A Club of Thirty Boys

HE president of a club of thirty boys "up State" in New Hamp- writes that they have a room in a large barn, re they have fitted up a nasium of which they are proud. They have built r own club table, and ches and book shelves, and they are getting ready to in a stove. The president s on to say: "Everybody hin thirty miles knows ut our club, though it has name and we wear no club ges of any kind. There t a boy within a radius of y miles who wouldn't give head to belong. Almost rybody in the county is glad do us a good turn, and we reciate it, I tell you; but I ess on the whole we are a tty decent set of boys. If go into the club room any ernoon between five and six, ich is the club's study hour, will find many of the mem- s there, quiet as mice, get- g their lessons for school next day, and we are not llycoddles either." The boys ve made small but excellent lections of agates, Indian ics and stamps, and they o have a good-sized aqua- m and many excellent ks, two daily papers and THE RISTIAN HERALD. This is an exam- of what a lot of good, sturdy boys do. We are glad to welcome them ong us. They write for suggestions making money with which to buy ngs for the club, and you may be e that the Aunt in the Cozy Corner s plenty of plans ready for them.

"The Swiss Family Brownies" is the me of a band of boys and girls in leigh, Ind. They seem to have the t times imaginable, and the nicest ng about the club is this: the mem- s pledge themselves to do a good n for some one on the sly whenever y see a chance. The secretary of club writes: "Each member is ex- ted to do some helpful act, no mat- how little it may be, every day for nebody and say nothing about it." e club has a post-box in which unsigned bits of paper are slipped describing the "good turns" that the happy members have succeeded in doing, and the secretary, who is evidently a very clever girl, weaves all these little scraps into a story which she reads aloud at each meeting of the club to the very great joy of the members. They write for a plan for celebrating Thanksgiving day, which is the second anniversary of their club meetings.

The Happiest Girls of All club, with a motto Love One Another, are giving a Penny Bazaar, which promises to be the merriest and happiest kind of an entertainment, by means of which they will put money in the bank to buy Christmas presents to send to a nearby hospital.

Angel Heads, by Sir Joshua Reynolds

The Golden Star and Crescent Club are a Bible class who meet once a week to teach the members of the infant class in the same Sunday School to sew. They write for plans for a mid-winter fête, and for making pin-money, too.

The Neighborhood Club in Boontown, Miss., are nine boys and girls between the ages of sixteen and eighteen, who have had good times together every alternate week for five years. They write for suggestions for an entertainment to celebrate their fifth anniversary.

The Happy-Go-Luckys, nine boys in Bellevue, Ohio, have turned their camping club into an indoor club for the winter. They write for new games, both indoor and outdoor, and for plans for making spending-money.

The Merry Hearts of Oakland, Calif., are fifteen little girls and boys organized by a very charming "Auntie Lou," who is the wife of the principal of one of the public schools. The dues are five cents a month and one cent for absence or tardiness. They have gotten up an attractive club booklet with work and play for ten meetings planned ahead. There are two delightful special parties, one for Thanksgiving and one for the last day of school before the holidays, and the verse on the cover of the booklet reads:

We must take our turn at the mill,
In grinding life's golden grain;
We must do each task with a resolute will,
Over and over again.

They want to make some Christmas money and ask for plans for a New Year's party.

How to Get Up a Club

IF YOU are thinking of getting up a club of any kind, get it up by all means and write about it to the Aunt in the Cozy Corner, who knows how often boys and girls wish that some older person would help them to plan their good times—some one who would help them with their work and play and lessons and pin-money making, who would suggest just the right thing to do at the right time and the right way to do it. The Aunt in the Cozy Corner can do all this for you, because she knows more about boys and girls and good times than any one else in the world, and she would like to tell you ever so many things to do.

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner has suggestions for all. So if you are planning to get up a club or be a member of one, do not wait, but rush a letter right off, and when you do write, be sure and give your age and the ages of the club members, and put your addresses all very clearly and distinctly in your letters.

If you enclose a stamped and addressed envelope, which of course you would, you will get an answer full of plans for happy times, in ever so many more ways than you can think of yourself, from

Lovingly and faithfully yours,

The Aunt in the Cozy Corner

Sir Joshua Reynolds

T IS told of Sir Joshua Reynolds that while he was painting thirty portraits of country squires for fifteen dollars iece when he was a young art student in the London ademy, he was once heard to say, "Those who are determined to excel in any art or craft must go to their work ether willing or unwilling, morning, noon and night, and ey will find success to be no play, but on the contrary very rd labor." Afterwards, when he was one of the three eat portrait painters of his time, one of the squires refilled his speech to him. "Those were good old days," he nswered. "I owe my success to em, and I attribute what genius may have to my capacity for rd work." Sir Joshua declared en when he was a very old man at whenever a new sitter came him he always began the portait by making up his mind that his one should be the best he ld ever painted." Success was ound to attend a man like that. The Angels' Heads" on this page one of the most famous of his intings. It hangs in the National Museum in London and is e positions of the head of the me boy.

A Walk Through the Woods

A WALK through the autumn woods is delightfully suggestive of attractive holiday gifts. A balsam pillow is always a welcome gift. Be sure to gather the young pale-green tips, and a bushel basket packed down is necessary to fill a twenty-inch pillow. Dry the tiny needles carefully by spreading them out on pieces of paper in a dark, dry room. A fine linen pillow filled with sweet clover tops is a grateful gift for an invalid, and clover may be picked until the first frost. Dry the clover tops in the sun; sprinkle them from time to time with a little salt; shake them every day or two, and when thoroughly dry sprinkle with a little powdered orris root. It will take fully three weeks to dry and treat the clovers thoroughly. But if you are sure to use the little wild sweet clover blossoms that grow on tall, straggly stems at the edges of wood-roads and sunny fields you will be surprised at the delicate charm of a sweet clover pillow.

Brander Cushing's Ambition

any committee for the Naval Club for years, sir.

Sidney neither ate nor drank that night, except by what might be called mere courtesy. Neither his father nor himself touched liquor at any time; another eccentricity of Brander Cushing's household. Sidney sat where he could see Admiral Marston's daughter. She looked older and far more dignified than she had looked at the shipyard that afternoon. Only once did she seem to notice him, and then she smiled as she nodded in friendly fashion.

When the ship came down the ways Sidney shut his eyes. He could see—! Would it never leave him—that memory? Bodies falling, falling, each one of eternal value—worth more than all that room full of wealth—but oh, how cruelly cheap they all seemed to fashion and beauty—to white, fair shoulders and sleek, fat cheeks of flabby-faced banqueters! And only a few hours ago! He found himself wondering even if any one there had heard of it—but news travels fast in big cities. He tested his own query by asking the young woman beside him—she was the daughter of a naval architect—"Miss Farley, have you heard anything about the burning of the naval factory this afternoon?"

"Why, yes, I heard some talk on the way home from the cathedral. Was it a very bad affair?" The girl smiled at Sidney as if she had said "And was it a very warm evening, Mr. Cushing?"

Sidney made some answer to which he heard the girl say "Oh!" and then, "Have you seen the new organ screen at St. John's? It's too beautiful for anything. The cathedral's going to be the showplace of New York when it's finished."

The secretary made a conventional navy and army speech. He congratulated the navy department on now possessing three of the largest fighting machines afloat. He paid a high compliment to Admiral Marston, who, he said, had brought the service up to a high degree of efficiency; and he closed his remarks by calling for a toast (drunk standing) to the United States navy, "Bigger and better every year."

When the distinguished company had subsided, after imbibing several gallons of champagne, Admiral Marston rose.

Sidney could not help contrasting him with his own father, who, as one of the speakers of honor, was seated beside the admiral to-night. Marston was thin, short, small-headed, with colorless eyes and a French beard. Cushing sat there, the handsomest man by far in that company, athletic, square-jawed, determined, the most wide-awake looking man in New York. "Does your father ever go to sleep?" Gordon Ford once asked Sidney. Other people wondered over the same question.

The admiral spoke in a dry, commonplace fashion, as if he had written his speech just before supper, and had it buttoned up in his pocket, as perhaps he had. He quoted a long list of figures to prove that the United States navy would have to add so many new types of vessels every year to make a fair showing in competition with Great Britain, Germany, or even with France and Japan.

And then he made the proposition that provoked the greatest applause of the evening.

"We are much embarrassed at the present time in the history of both army and navy, on account of a failure on the part of young men to enlist. The Department may as well acknowledge that we face a grave and alarming situation. Owing to business enticement, whereby a young man can begin his career in many cases with a higher salary than the United States can proffer to some of its officers after they have been in the service many years, the army and navy suffer for lack of intelligent and capable recruits. To the cause of a lack of material for the rank and file must be added the efforts of so-called peace reformers, really fanatics, who are inflaming the public mind with appeals to prejudice against war and military equipment. There is great danger that unless this narrow-minded fanaticism is checked, the military spirit will in a short time die out of the nation. This would be nothing short of a calamity, the effect of which would be difficult to estimate. Now, the situation calls for some large and fitting plan which will educate the youth of the land into enthusiastic patriots. We must create a military spirit in our youth. I am ready to propose a plan—in brief, to suggest one; and I trust, Mr. Secretary, that it will meet with your distinguished approval—as, indeed, I venture to believe it will. My plan is to institute in all our high schools military companies to be trained and instructed in all military tactics, the use of firearms in actual drill and the regular inculcation of military patriotism." (Great applause.)

The admiral went on to elucidate his plan in some detail, and when he finally sat down the applause again was deafening.

"Give 'em real rifles. No wooden imitations!" yelled one of the money kings, whose father had hired a substitute in the Civil War.

This seemed to be the universal sentiment, including that of the girl who sat next to Sidney.

"Wouldn't that be fine?" she said. "How proud we will be of our handsome high school cadets!"

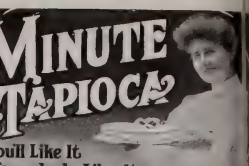
"Yes, fine!" said Sidney.

At the same time he could not account for the strange feeling of uneasiness in his mind. He did not try to analyze it. Late banquets are not choice places in which to analyze, and at the next moment his father had risen to respond to the toast of "The Builder."

Sidney liked to hear his father talk on the few occasions when he yielded to invitation. The hour was late, half-past twelve. But the minute Brander Cushing began, some people who had risen to go out sat down again.

"At any rate," Sidney thought with real pride, "the pater isn't theorizing. He talks United States about things he knows. Even admirals may not always know. But the pater—the navy would not amount to much if some one didn't know how to build the ships."

Cushing talked straight on. He gave some interesting facts about the dimensions and powers of the monster launched that afternoon, and then went on to speak of the next warship authorized by Congress, which was yet only outlined on paper, many details still unworked.



"I think, though, I may safely say, Mr. Secretary, and ladies and gentlemen, that the next vessel to come from the Cushing shipyards will be the most perfect fighting machine ever devised by the brain and hand of man. It is already, as it begins to take shape in my mind, destined to excel any type yet devised. I do not hesitate to say, in this presence, that it is the greatest ambition of my life to give to the navy in this last and largest battleship the most perfect and splendid warship ever built, of which the admiralty and the country shall have no reason to be ashamed."

He spoke a few minutes longer, and with perfect good taste finished and sat down at exactly the right moment.

The applause exceeded even that given the secretary himself. And that personage good-naturedly acknowledged it as he leaned over and held out his hand as the guests were leaving ter the final crash of The Star-angled Banner by the band.

Brander Cushing's Ambition

"You made the speech of the even-g, Cushing. I look to see your life mbition realized in the new vessel."

Miss Marston passed close to Sidney she and her father were going out.

"Don't forget about that call if you me to Washington, Mr. Cushing, ll you?"

"I certainly will not forget, if you ant me to remember. Do you?"

The girl hesitated, blushed, looked wn, then up again, let her eyes look ll into his and said:

"Yes."

Sidney felt the same sense of audac-y on his part which he had expe-enced at the launching. And all the ay home he dwelt upon it. There as something about Pax Marston's anner— But after he had fallen sleep, he waked with a nervous start. t once he went over the scene of the re. Those bodies, falling, falling, e helplessness of it all, the useless-ess of it all; how fearful to stand here unable to do anything! The weat came out on his face in great eads of agony as he recalled its hor-or. Again he was racing up the airs of the double-decker, crashing nto people running down, panting and asping, crying out silently, "Wait! Wait!"

Again the girl at the window oppo-ite. She was not a real person. here was no feature to be recognized. nly a face blackened and blurred, her ery hands burning—were they burn-ng? It seemed so; but she was talk-ng calmly to the panic-stricken irls, a strong girl, a brave girl! Hermosa! Hermosa! Hermosa!" he flame and smoke spelled it on his rain. And its fantastic refrain was eating back and forth with the word Athanasia! Athanasia! Athanasia!" Now the board was slipping under his oot, he felt it going, he could not stop t. Again, those bodies falling, falling —would the picture never leave him?

In the morning, when he and his ather sat down to breakfast at the usual hour, each noted the unusual in he other's face.

"Yesterday was a trying day for ou, Sid. They've got you in the apers, all right. 'Daring deed of eroism on part of Sidney Cushing, on of Brander Cushing of the ship-ards,' etc. 'Saves lives of dozen girls t risk of his own!' Your picture is here, too. Where did they get that?"

"I don't know."

Brander Cushing was evidently proud of the prominence given his son's part in the newspaper account. He read eagerly but with no outward sign of emotion.

"Over a hundred victims, Sid. It was a horrible thing. Horrible! Do you want to see the paper?"

He passed it across the table and took up his coffee.

"No, father, I don't care to read it. What is the use? I dreamed of it all night."

He pushed the paper back, and his father picked it up again as if attracted and repelled by something that suddenly caught his eye.

He turned the pages over. Pause.

"There's a full account of the banquet. The speeches are given in full. Admiral Marston's plan for high school military drill provokes much favorable comment at Washington and New York."

"You made the best speech of the evening, father."

"Thank you, Sid. I would rather hear you say it than the secretary."

He glanced through the banquet report, and then turned the leaves back to the first page, which featured the naval factory holocaust. Something there seemed to fascinate him. He glanced up two or three times at Sidney as if he were in doubt; then, in his usual direct, bold manner, he said: "Fleming has issued his ultimatum."

"What is that, father?"

"Fleming, the county attorney, is reported here as threatening to bring a case against us for failure to provide fire-escapes."

"Let me see." Sidney put out his hand for the paper.

"I'll read it to you."

Brander Cushing read in an even tone:

" 'Loss of life heavy on account of failure to provide fire-escapes on the side next the double-decker. Brander Cushing and the shipyard company are said to be liable. County Attorney Fleming says he will push the investigation no matter who suffers. The grand jury will bring indictments. Fire marshal notice was served ten weeks ago. Under the new law all owners of buildings requiring fire-escapes must act within four weeks of marshal's notice. Where notice has not been given, the owners of buildings are not liable. It is up to the marshal to furnish proof that such notice has been legally served. The shipyard firm will have to give reason, if any, why the law was not obeyed. Looks as if Brander Cushing and the company would have to face a serious charge. The indictment will be "contributory negligence." This under the statute is punishable by a fine of $1,000 and five years in State prison.'"

Brander Cushing paused in his even-toned reading and looked over at his son. Sidney was staring, white-faced and still.

"Five years in State prison," repeated Brander Cushing softly, and went on:

" 'There is a tremendous feeling in the factory district over this horrible affair. Threats of all sorts are being made. Those who have lost children and relatives are frenzied and dazed by the calamity. We do not envy the shipyard company. It is stated on Mr. Cushing's authority that full compensation will be granted the sufferers. But compensation in money will not satisfy the people. It looks as if some one would have to be punished for violation of the law, and County Attorney Fleming says he will push the case to the limit. If the marshal's notice was served duly, as we understand it was, then it looks like a hard case for Brander Cushing and the shipyard.' "

"You understand, of course, Sid, that this is the fine hand of Mr. Alfred Fleming. The Morning Megaphone is his organ. I don't expect any mercy from him, and I won't get any."

"But, father! Is there no way?—think of it! Jail—disgrace!—all—"

"There is always a way. I don't expect to go to jail any more than Fleming. Leave it with me."

"But the marshal's—"

Brander Cushing finished his coffee and deliberately rose.

"Don't let it worry you, Sid. I am not afraid of Fleming nor all his gang. I have whipped them before and I will do it this time."

The bell rang.

The servant was going out.

"If it's reporters, Angus, tell them I'll talk with them down at the shipyard office at ten o'clock."

Angus came back.

"I've given your message, sir, and they say they will not leave until they have seen you, sir."

"Well, they can see me down at the yard. I will not talk to them here."

Angus went out; Brander Cushing grimly took down his hat and, after a moment of indecision, started to go out into the hall.

"Father!" Sidney, stretching out his arms, appealed almost with a sob: "You'll let me—you will not forget—I will stand by you in this affair."

"I know you will, Sid. Don't fear.

NEHEMIAH'S PRAYER*

Sunday School Lesson by Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

NEHEMIAH was a young man, a son of the captivity, having been born of Jewish parents in Babylon. His ability and his acquirements had won royal favor, and he was made an officer in the king's palace. We would say he was the chief steward. The life of the king was in his hand, for to be cupbearer to the king was a part of his duty, and each time when he passed a cup to the king, he had to go through the ceremony of pouring some of its contents into his own hand, and drinking it as a surety that it was not poisoned.

Although an officer in a foreign court, there was an altar of patriotism in the soul of Nehemiah, and one day a live coal of fire fell upon that altar, and prayer began to ascend like holy incense. Once, when Nehemiah was walking outside the walls of the city, he saw some travelers, who had evidently come from a long distance. Their conversation reached his ears, and he recognized that they were Hebrews, and that they had come from Jerusalem, and as it proved, one of them was his own brother (Neh. 7: 2). Naturally Nehemiah's first question was about the prosperity of Jerusalem. Sad indeed was the report: "The few that are left ["the remnant"] are in great affliction and reproach; the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof are burned with fire." This report was the live coal which fell upon the altar of patriotism in the heart of Nehemiah, and he entered upon a season of fasting and prayer which lasted for four months.

The Prayer of Nehemiah

It was accompanied with tears for the sins of his people and for his own shortcomings. It was offered in awe before "the great and terrible God." It was offered in assurance that God would hear the prayer: "Let thine ear now be attentive." It was made in confidence that God would be merciful, as "a God who keepeth covenant and sheweth loving kindness." It was offered with gratitude for what God had promised he would do for his people: "Though your outcasts were in the uttermost parts of the heavens, yet will I gather them from hence, and will bring them unto the place that I have chosen, to cause my name to dwell there." It was offered with continuance—for about four months. "Grant mercy in the sight of this man." It was thus that Nehemiah prayed that God would make the heart of the king favorable when he should request of him that he might be released from his duties in the palace to go to Jerusalem for the uplift of his people.

The Outcome of Nehemiah's Prayer

God moved the heart of the king to be patient with Nehemiah when he appeared with a sad face bearing the king's cup. The king inquired, "Why is thy face sad?" And Nehemiah himself tells us: "I was sore afraid," because such conduct was punishable by death. But the king kindly asked, "Why is the sorrow in thy heart?" Then Nehemiah told him all, and made his request known. The king answered, "Yes," and gave him all that he further desired: letters to the governors ruling under the king, to secure their protection and co-operation; a letter to the keeper of the king's forest, to furnish timber for the necessary building in Jerusalem; and an escort of captains of the army and horsemen, that his journey to Jerusalem might be made safely. In all these deliverances Nehemiah recognized God's answer to his prayer. In this connection let us read with emphasis the words of the Golden Text: "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much."

Lord, Teach Us to Pray

The Jewish high priest wore a breastplate which contained twelve jewels, set in a framework of gold. These were: the red carnelian, the yellow-green peridot, the bright green emerald, the red ruby, the gold and blue lapis-lazuli, the blue onyx, the deep-blue sapphire, the banded agate, the purple amethyst, the glowing golden topaz, the delicate blue-green beryl and the reddish brown jasper. On each one of these stones was engraved the name of a tribe of Israel, there being twelve tribes, and twelve names in all. It was a beautiful reminder to the high priest of those who should be in his loving thought and prayer.

The Christian's Breastplate of Prayer

HOME	CHURCH	OUR LAND
MISSIONARIES	THE SICK	THE TEMPTED
THE POOR	ALL CHRISTIAN WORKERS	OURSELVES
OUR ENEMIES	OUR FRIENDS	UNBELIEVERS

Let it be a reminder of how we should pray, and for whom we should pray. (This would be effective drawn on the blackboard.)

Home.—A prayer breathes in the dear old song, "There's no place like home." In the olden days we used to see quite commonly the motto, "God bless our home," done in needlework, or printed in illuminated text, framed, and hung on the wall. It was like a perpetual prayer and no doubt many prayers were prompted by it.

Church.—In a certain locality a revival began simultaneously in four churches without any preconceived arrangement. "This work must be in answer to somebody's prayers," people began to say, and then the question was asked: "Who is praying?" After some time it was found that two old church members, living a mile apart, had made arrangements to meet half way in a piece of thick bushes every evening at sundown to pray God to revive his work. Their prayers were answered, and in three months' time one hundred and fifty persons were added to the churches. Let this encourage us to pray, not only for the church to which we belong, but for the churches that are round about us.

Our Land.—Let us pray as we sing:

Our fathers' God, to thee,
Author of liberty,
To thee we sing;
Long may our land be bright
With freedom's holy light;
Protect us by thy might,
Great God, our King.

No day should pass without prayer for our land and our rulers.

Missionaries.—It is not enough that we should remember those who labor for the kingdom in the adverse circumstances that obtain in the foreign field with our gifts. They need the daily support and comfort of our prayers in their daily struggle against

How Holeproof Leads All Hose

Think these advantages over. Here are hose made with the finest yarn sold, costing an average of 70c a pound. No one can pay any more; for this Egyptian and Sea Island cotton yarn is the costliest yarn produced.

This yarn is three-ply, soft, fine and flexible. So we can make the hose in the lightest weights. The cotton is long fibre, so the yarn is extra strong. We could buy common yarn for 30c a pound.

No other hose can be softer, more stylish or better in any way. "Holeproof" has every advantage. And in addition, it has the enormous advantage of six months' wear in every six pairs. Try "Holeproof" and see. You'll never go back to the old-fashioned kind—to hose that wear out in a week.

FAMOUS Holeproof Hosiery FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

But get the genuine "Holeproof." Look on the toe of each pair for the signature—

Carl Freschl, Pres.

Unless you find it the hose are an imitation, no matter who says they are not.

The genuine are sold in your town. We'll tell you the dealers' names on request, or ship direct where there's no dealer near, charges prepaid on receipt of remittance.

Prices for six pairs, guaranteed six months, $1.50 to $3.00, according to finish and weight. Ask to see silk "Holeproof." Three pairs, guaranteed three months, $2.00 for men, $3.00 for women.

norance, superstition and indifference.

The Sick.—Dr. Lyman Abbott tells following story about prayer for a k child: "A mother of my acquaintce had a child taken alarmingly ill. e sent for the physician. The doctor gan at once vigorously to apply the ustomed remedies, but all was in n. Death seemed close at hand l inevitable. At length he left the ld, and sat down by the window, king out. He seemed to the agond mother to have abandoned her eling. She could do nothing but y, and even her prayer was but an rticulate and unvoiced cry for help. ddenly the physician started from seat. 'Send and see if there be any son weed in the yard!' he cried. s order was obeyed; the poisonous ed was found. The remedies were stantly changed, and it was found t the child had swallowed enough the seeds of this deadly weed to ve killed a man. The physician bsequently said that in that five nutes every kindred case he had ever own in a quarter century's practice ssed before his mind. Among them s the one case which suggested the al, but before hidden cause of the otracted and dreadful convulsions, d the child was saved. Now is there ything unphilosophical or inconsistt in the belief that at the critical oment, a loving God, answering the other's helpless cry, flashed on the nd of the physician the thought that ved the child?" This incident should courage us all to pray for sick ones.

The Tempted.—"Some two years ago poor woman, accompanied by two of r neighbors, came to my vestry in ep distress," says Dr. Spurgeon. er husband had fled the country. e told me her story, and a very sad e it was. I said, 'There is nothing e can do but to kneel down and cry to e Lord for the immediate conversion your husband.' We knelt down, and prayed that the Lord would touch e heart of the deserter, convert his ul, and bring him back to his home. hen we rose from our knees, I said the poor woman, 'Do not fret about e matter. I feel sure your husband ill come home, and that he will yet come connected with our church.' me months afterward she reappeared with her neighbors and a man hom she introduced as her husband. n making inquiry and comparing tes, we found that on the very day which we had prayed for his conersion, he, being at that time on oard a ship, stumbled unexpectedly n a stray copy of one of my sermons. e read it, the truth went to his heart, e repented and sought the Lord, he eturned to his home, and was admitted as a member to our church. hat woman does not doubt the power f prayer."

The Poor.—"We pray for the poor n their poverty, their suffering, their orrow. Let a blessing rest on the hildren of the poor, especially for hose for whom no prayer rises in heir own homes. Turn the hearts of rayerless parents, rich or poor, to heir children. Especially we pray or those in discouragement, those who have had reverses and losses, with whom life is not going prosperously. Keep them from being too much cast down. Give them courage nd hope and sustain them by thy race."—Doctor J. R. Miller.

All Christian Workers.—

With eyes on manuscript attent,
On theologic doctrine bent,
The Preacher often spends his views,
Nor knows the starving in his pews—
"The sheep look up and are not fed."

And oft in academic halls,
Hid from the world by cloist'ring walls,
The Teacher, in his learning's pride,
Forgets the pupil at his side—
"The sheep look up and are not fed."

O men of Christ, sent forth to preach
The better way, the truth to teach,
Still is he asking, 'Lov'st thou me?'
Still is our proof of loyalty
That those who hunger shall be fed.

JOHN FINLEY in The Outlook.

Ourselves.—"That which I cannot foresee I beseech thee prevent; that which I cannot withstand, I beseech thee master; that which I fear, I beseech thee unmask and prostrate; that, being delivered from all danger both of soul and body, I may praise thee, the Deliverer, and see how happy a thing it is to make the Lord of Hosts my helper in the day of trouble, as well as in the day of joy."—Archbishop Laud.

Our Enemies.—Mr. Gibbon was a young man spending his first year in China as a missionary. One day, being alone in his home, he heard loud and confused sounds. A large crowd was passing his home and pointing to it as they shouted and gesticulated. Fear possessed Mr. Gibbon as he heard the shouting. He knelt and prayed, asking for courage and wisdom, and for the light to dawn upon those poor heathen people. A knock was heard at the door, he quickly opened it and welcomed his good friend and teacher, Mr. Cheng. "I am beginning to fear for your safety," said Mr. Cheng. "There's no controlling these mobs when they are exasperated. You know there has been no rain for a long time, and they say that the foreigner, meaning you, has walked around the city several times, and in this way prevented the rain from coming. And now," continued Mr. Cheng, "we must have a public meeting and pray for rain. God will answer our prayers, and rain will come!" Mr. Cheng left Mr. Gibbon's house to have the meeting announced. A large number of people gathered, among them a few Christians, and they awaited the coming of "the foreigner." The meeting opened with several hymns, and then Mr. Gibbon and the native Christians began to pray. Not many prayers had been offered before black clouds began to cover the sky, then the rain came, and it continued a whole day. God had answered prayer. The people believed "the foreigner," and listened to the story of the Cross.

Our Friends.—

I cannot tell why there should come to me
A thought of some one miles and miles away.
In swift insistence on the memory,
Unless there be a need that I should pray.

* * * * * *

Perhaps just then my friend has fiercest fight,
A more appalling weakness, a decay
Of courage, darkness, some lost sense of sight;
And so, in case he needs my prayer, I pray.

Friend, do the same for me if I intrude
Unasked upon you on some crowded day.
Give me a moment's prayer as interlude;
Be very sure I need it, therefore pray.

The Good Samaritan Recalled

THE "khan" or inn of the Good Samaritan—the scene of one of Christ's parables—is well known to Palestine travelers. In an article in Scribner's for November, Lewis Gaston Leary tells us of the present condition of this ancient landmark. He writes: "The innkeeper is an American citizen, though Syrian born, and the combination of inherited Semitic business instinct and acquired Yankee shrewdness is such that the Inn of the Good Samaritan will not suffer bankruptcy in our generation. Another name for this inn is the 'Red Khan,' probably so called from the streaks of red which, at this stage of the journey, are splashed along the brown hillsides. 'The Ascent of Blood' was near by, and the thought of blood or redness survives in many local names. The contours of the hills are now less rounded. Sometimes they are jagged, or deeply and regularly chiseled, like the turrets of a fortress where once the Crusaders pointed out a squared summit which looked like a ruined castle; so when at last we pass the remains of a real stronghold, it is hard to believe that the Castel Rouge is not merely another sculptured hill, instead of a grim fortress where once the Crusaders guarded the Jericho road and the Ascent of Blood."

BEFORE you start to make the ice cream, look on the pantry shelf to see if your corn starch is the reliable Kingsford's package and not an inferior substitute for which you have paid the same price. It will make a great difference.

The value of Kingsford's is due to its fineness, its delicacy and purity. Even if you have plenty of cream use some Kingsford's to give a firm, smooth-grained ice cream that will mold well and dish well.

KINGSFORD'S
CORN STARCH

Kingsford's Ice Cream—Sift together one-half cup sugar, one-half teaspoon salt, one level tablespoon Kingsford's Corn Starch. Add one pint milk and stir over hot water till it thickens. Cover and cook twelve minutes, stirring occasionally. Into one-half cup sugar, gradually beat the yolks of three eggs already beaten. Stir into the hot mixture and keep on stirring till it thickens. Pour into freezer when cold, flavor to taste and add one pint cream, and freeze as usual.

You Can SEE that These Are Not Ordinary Dates

Each one is tempting in appearance—plump, meaty and rich in sweet moisture.

Dromedary Dates

From the Garden of Eden

will give your palate new thrills. You'll eat them like a six-year-old and never feel the after-effect that generally comes with things as dainty and delicious as are Dromedary Dates.

Besides eating them as they are, you can also prepare them in a never-ending list of palatable dishes.

They are picked in our date gardens in Arabia, near the banks of the River Euphrates, where for centuries has grown the finest crop the world ever produced.

Dromedary Dates are fresher and cleaner than those you are accustomed to buy from large, open boxes. The fruit is carefully wrapped in waxed paper that keeps it uncontaminated by dust, air or fingers, and is packed in convenient-sized cartons.

They are sold by the better class of grocers and fruiterers, or if you desire sample, a special-sized package will be sent on receipt of 10 cents to help cover cost of packing and postage.

Anyway, write for our New Cook Book—free, if you give us your dealer's name and address. Contains recipes for dates, figs, cocoanuts, etc. Well worth a place in your kitchen.

Peace Circles Discuss Hospitality

THE importance of the practice of International Hospitality can scarcely be exaggerated, and the responsibility of teaching its principles with ever increasing ardor devolves largely upon the citizens of the United States, for in no territory on the face of the earth are representatives of all nations gathered together in such large numbers.

While the teachings of the principles of International Hospitality are vastly important in every country where the Peace Movement is making headway, when we remember the deep significance of the term International Hospitality linked with our national watchword Democracy, it may be clearly understood that in no other land can the feelings and sentiments of the new order, the new patriotism, and new theories of human relationships be so easily engendered as in our own country, and the important task becomes almost immediately our obligation.

The Board of International Hospitality is working toward the promotion of friendship through hospitality. It began its existence by entertaining Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, the famous French peace advocate. It would be a good thing if the United States would entertain King George of England, Emperor William of Germany, the President of France, or their representatives, for example, and there should be more intercollegiate clubs like the Cosmopolitans, which from a little club of eighteen students in 1903 has developed into a powerful body of over two thousand young men, representing upward of sixty different countries at the present time.

"Above all nations is humanity" is the motto of the club. President Eliot declared the Harvard branch of the Cosmopolitans to be the most interesting thing in the university.

An annual interchange of professorships between our colleges and universities should be much more universal, and the various lessons beginning with the committing to memory of Bible texts and such sentiments as these taught: "If the thousandth part of what has been expended in war and preparing its mighty engines had been devoted to the development of reason and the diffusion of Christian principles, nothing would have been known for centuries past of its terrors, its sufferings, its impoverishment, its demoralization, but what was learned from history."—Horace Mann.

Were half the power that fills the world with terror,
Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts
Given to redeem the human mind from error,
There were no need of arsenals and forts.

Christian Herald Peace League Booklet

Our pamphlet No. 4, "Organizations for Promoting International Friendships," by A. L. Mead, bears largely upon the topic for discussion in CHRISTIAN HERALD Peace League Circles during the coming fortnight, which is International Hospitality. The booklet includes stories of interesting and delightful organizations, educational and social, already existing, for the promoting of friendship among nations, and will be forwarded free of charge to all who are interested in the subject of world peace. Kindly enclose two cent stamp to cover postage.

Programme

The programme for fortnight ending November 29 is the same as the programme given in our issue of November 1, with the exception of the changed theme, which is Ways and Means of Promoting International Hospitality.

Address all communications to the Secretary of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Peace League, Bible House, New York City.

Modern Warfare

The defenders of war speak of civilized warfare. Is there such a thing?

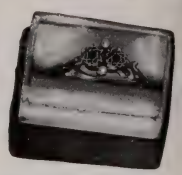
The special correspondent of the London Times telegraphs from Tripoli a story of war that in its hideousness is almost unbelievable. "The severity with which the Italian army exacted retribution from the Arabs who rose last Monday might almost be described as indiscriminate slaughter. It has been a miserable business, but in the circumstances I presume the General Staff had no alternative but to give this horrid lesson. The considerations were these: The Turks had succeeded in enlisting the active sympathies of a greater number of Arabs than was anticipated. It was known that the Turks before their evacuation of the town had distributed ten thousand magazine rifles and many rounds of ammunition to the local Arabs. Only five thousand of these rifles were collected. The Italians therefore were forced to harsh measures by a sudden rising by five thousand armed Arabs in the rear of their line of defense, in a country the intricacy of which beggars description. The Italians having set themselves to cow the Arabs, the floodgates of blood and lust were opened, the men got beyond control, and the innocent suffered with the guilty. The memory of this awful retribution will take long to live down. Even making allowances for the exigencies of the military situation, there is every possibility that the hideous severity of this retribution will give rise to a war of sanguinary and pitiless reprisals. War is merciless. I have witnessed one of its most horrible phases. Nothing more deplorable than the scenes of massacre at Tripoli have been witnessed for many a year. The natives caught were shot en masse upon the orders given by the Italian authorities. The innocent and the guilty alike were wiped out. Many of those killed were quite young and a great number of women perished.

"One hardly knows to what limit the elasticity of the phrase 'military exigencies' will be stretched in the twentieth century."

But we do know that the Italians, mistakenly confident of conquering not only the people of Tripoli but the Arabs as well, were, by a series of typical war blunders, the most serious of which are criminal miscalculation of the actual cost of their attack in human life and money, and a general misunderstanding of the actual difficulties to be encountered, were doomed to bitter disappointment. Italy, by a cynical disregard of the rights of others, almost in a single moment fell from the place she had acquired in the admiration, confidence and affection of the world.

From "The Return"

Peace is declared, an' I return
To 'Acknеystadt, but not the same;
Things 'ave transpired which made me learn
The size and meanin' of the game.
I did no more than others did,
I don't know where the change began;
I started as a average kid,
I finished as a thinkin' man.



Towns without people, ten times took,
An' ten times left an' burned at last;
An' starvin' dogs that come to look
For owners when a column passed;
An' quiet, 'omesick talks between Men, met by night, you never knew
Until—'is face—by shellfire seen—
Once—an' struck off. They taught me too.

The day's lay-out—the mornin' sun
Beneath your 'at-brim as you sight;
The dinner-'ush from noon till one,
An' the full roar that lasts till night;
An' the pore dead that look so old
An' was so young an hour ago,
An' legs tied down before they're cold—
These are the things which make you know.

So 'ath it come to me—not pride,
Nor yet conceit, but on the 'ole
(If such a term may be applied),
The makin's of a bloomin' soul.

The Land of the Seminoles

IN THE Semi-Tropic Florida Yearbook Mr. W. Stanley Hanson gives an interesting account of a trip into the Everglades of Florida. Mr. Hanson states his belief that possibly less is known to-day about the lives and customs of the remnant band of Indians we call the Seminoles, who dwell amid the forests of the wilderness of southern Florida, than any tribe of redskins on the North American continent. Very few white men and still fewer white women, have ever seen the real life of the Indian people.

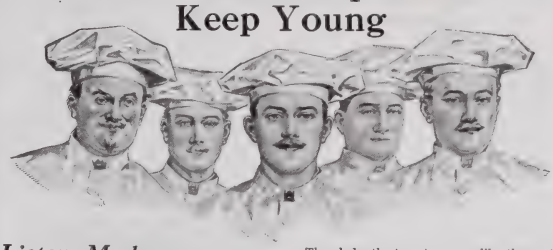
"If the reader will take a map of Florida; find Lee County, and draw a line southeast from Fort Myers, the commercial centre of this great unknown country, he will note the names of such ruins as 'Old Fort Simon Gray,' 'Fort Shackleford,' 'Sam Jones' Old Town,' etc., and provided the map be of late origin, he will observe a township and some odd sections of land and water, blocked off in colors designate what is intended as a last reservation for these poor, neglected people. The hour is close at hand when they must forever 'hang up de gun an' de bow,' for little now remains for these real natives of the land of Flowers out of the 58,000 square miles we call Florida.

"The Miami Indians are leaving their old familiar hunting grounds on the coast and moving still further and further westward into the hammocks—those jungles of the Everglades are little known—of the Big Cypress country, for they cannot longer stand out against the stare of the unwelcome white settler, who now comes to take from them not only the reclaimed marshes but the game of the chase.

"Some time ago the writer accompanied the caravan of Dr. Godden, the missional missionary to the Seminoles, on a visit to the mission station and the Indian camps. We took our departure from Fort Myers after nightfall. Traveling for some hours we finally halted and made camp at Scrub Ridge, distant about thirteen miles on the way. The next morning we were up at break of day and by dinner we had reached the old familiar Half-way House, a spot often used in bygone days by the happy cowboys when they wished to try the speed of their ponies. Nightfall we were winding our way through the pretty little hamlet of Immokalee—meaning 'my home' in Seminole—which is just thirty-two miles inland from Fort Myers. The journey from Immokalee on south is most interesting in the extreme, for from the hilly pine forests the country changes suddenly into expansive, open, flower-bedecked prairies, which extend for many miles in unbroken view, only an occasional clump of palmetto palms or pines appearing to relieve the monotony of the distance. Of every hand our progress frightened up large flocks of various-colored wild fowl, for this is the undisputed home of the animal and bird kingdoms. Some eight miles from Immokalee we entered the great Ocalawacoochee Slough, and were soon penetrating the famous Big Cypress Swamp, where we made our camp on an island which is the site of the ruins of Old Fort Simon Gray, where Uncle Sam's soldiers established a military post while fighting the Seminoles some fifty years ago. Here we found comfortable resting-places under the towering moss-laden oak trees, which grow to surprising size. The towering trees are alive with hanging festoons of Spanish moss, trailing sometimes forty feet or more from tree to tree, while the orchids and ferns grow everywhere in dense clusters, as do the airplants so common to the Everglade swamps. Birds of various sorts and of as many colors as Joseph's coat are seen darting here and there among the beautiful trees, while the fish splash and dive in the numerous small lakes in the heart of the Big Cypress. So dense is the growth of overhanging trees in this swamp that the water in the little lakes is in temperature almost like ice water, even in the summer months.

"The trip over the Ocalawacoochee prairies from the Big Cypress to Leaning Oak Gap was soon made, and at dusk on the third night out we arrived at Tony's Pine Island. After a few hours' sleep we were again on the go. We passed many interesting spots, and every little while our dogs would start up droves of wild turkeys which were feeding on the gall and palmetto berries that abound on the prairies. Our dogs often started up the feeding deer, which would run in front of our teams when seeking safety in the nearby jungles. In many of the forests we found old abandoned Indian camps and deserted fields, in which are wild groves of oranges, bananas, pawpaws and guavas.

"Early in the afternoon of the third day we passed in sight of Butterfly Island, which is the breeding-place of untold millions of gorgeously colored butterflies which infest the flowers of the Everglade prairies at certain seasons of the year. We were informed that at times, while breeding, these insects would form clouds so dense as to resemble smoke. This island of butterflies is only a few miles from the boat-landing where the Episcopal mission station is located, in the very edge of the far-famed Everglades. On our arrival we were warmly welcomed by Dr. Godden, the big-hearted missionary who is giving his life to this work among the Seminoles. The mission station is located on a small island less than half an acre in extent, and consists of a two-story hospital, chapel house, pharmacy, general store, etc., together with several houses which are used for residential purposes by the attachés of the mission, and as quarters for the visiting Indians and their families, although they frequently camp in the forests near the mission while doing their trading at the post, in preference to occupying the houses provided for them.



"It is an interesting sight to see them and their canoes at the mission station, the members of the several clans being easily distinguished by their peculiar dress, which varies in the color scheme to show the family to which its wearer belongs. There are three divisions of the Seminoles, known as the Miami, Cow Creek and Big Cypress, the larger number being in the Big Cypress division. During the last few months numbers of the Miami Indians have come over to join forces with the Big Cypress clan, and some of the hammock jungles to the south of the mission station are becoming thickly settled, for it is quite evident the Indians have concluded that it is in these impenetrable jungles that they must make their last stand for existence.

"The Bishop of Southern Florida is making a hard fight to have the Government set aside a few townships of land in southern Lee and northern Monroe Counties as a permanent reservation for the remaining Indians, in whose behalf he has so faithfully worked these many years."

Japan's Big Navy

JAPAN'S cabinet will ask parliament for an appropriation of 350,000,000 yen, or about $175,000,000, for the construction of new vessels. Of this sum 270,000,000 yen, or $135,000,000, will be used in building seven dreadnoughts and two armored cruisers of 30,000 tons each. The balance of the 350,000,000 yen will be devoted to the construction of smaller craft. The programme is to be completed in seven years.

Let Them Help You Keep Young

Listen, Madam:

You could, if you wished, spin flax and weave cloth—knit the men's socks—do your sewing by hand, just as our grandmothers did. And you can, as they did, bake beans.

But don't you think women's time is now better employed? And don't you know that modern women keep younger?

Our part in the change lies in baking good beans. Our chefs are now baking for a million homes.

They send the beans to you all ready to serve, with all the fresh oven flavor. And this expert service costs you less than home baking, because our chefs bake for so many.

They use Michigan beans—just the whitest and plumpest, picked out by hand. They make their sauce from whole, vine-ripened tomatoes. It costs five times what common sauce would cost.

They bake the tomato sauce, like the pork, with the beans. The delicious zest goes clear through.

They have steam-heated ovens always kept at 245 degrees. Thus they give to each bean more than twice the heat that gets to most of the home-baked beans. As a result, Van Camp's digest. They don't tax the stomach, don't ferment and form gas, don't go to waste like home-baked beans.

The beans come out nut-like, mealy and whole—none broken, none mushy, none crisped, none hard. That's because we bake in steam ovens.

The home way requires full sixteen hours of soaking, boiling and baking. The meal for to-morrow must be started to-day. Our way means a dozen meals, ready on the pantry shelf.

Don't you know of a way to spend bean-baking time in some happier way out of the kitchen?

Another pity is, with home baking, folks don't get beans enough. Beans are 23 per cent. nitrogenous—84 per cent. nutriment. They are richer than beef in nutriment, yet cost but one-third as much.

Beans are our racial food—the favorite dish of the hungry. The only reason why you don't serve them often is this bother of home baking.

Please try the best beans in America. Not common baked beans—not inferior beans. Tell your grocer to send Van Camp's.

A GREAT EDITOR GONE

JOSEPH PULITZER, editor and proprietor of the New York World, who passed away on October 29 on his yacht, Liberty, while it lay in the harbor of Charleston, S. C., was a noted figure in American journalism. He was born in Budapest, Hungary, in 1847. He was educated by a private tutor. He came to this country in 1864 and served in a cavalry regiment during the Civil War. The next few years were trying ones to the young Hungarian, but he was ambitious and worked hard and studied harder. In 1868 he joined the staff of the Westliche Post, a German newspaper in St. Louis. It soon became apparent that he had at last found his true vocation, for he quickly rose to be managing editor and part proprietor. In 1878 he bought the St. Louis Dispatch, and afterward the Post, combining the two under the name of the Post-Dispatch. Under his skilful management the new paper was a brilliant success.

Although an enviable career lay before Mr. Pulitzer in the West, he was ambitious to enter the metropolitan field and in 1883 he became owner and editor of the New York World. Then began a career of work and public service which entitles him to a place among the great leaders of American journalism. His methods, which were distinctly those of the West, caused a stir among the Eastern newspapers. Under his personal direction his paper forged rapidly ahead in circulation and influence. "Public service" was his motto and he always held to it loyally, with the result that he built up a great journalistic property with a far-reaching influence in public affairs.

Personally, Mr. Pulitzer was one of the most able and appreciative of men. He spurred his staff to constant endeavor by introducing a system of rewards for specially efficient service. He greatly valued new ideas and was ever on the lookout for them. He fought on the side of good government and honest politics and strove to make his paper a moral force. Graft and corruption and every form of public wrongdoing he mercilessly exposed. His journalistic creed may be gathered from the following message which he cabled to his editorial associates in 1907:

"Always fight for progress and reform; never tolerate injustice or corruption; always fight demagogues of all parties; never belong to any party; always oppose privileged classes and public plunder; never lack sympathy with the poor; always remain devoted to the public welfare; never be satisfied with merely printing news; always be drastically independent; never be afraid to attack wrong, whether by predatory plutocracy or predatory poverty."

Overwork caused his partial retirement from active service twenty years ago, although to the last he continued his active interest in the paper. His eyes, never strong, gave him increasing trouble and at last his sight entirely failed. He lived thereafter in constant eclipse; but his papers and correspondence were read to him daily and there was nothing of moment that escaped his attention. His infirmity could not diminish the ardor of that spirit which had so bravely fought the battle of life, rising from obscurity to eminence. His later years were spent in the search for health.

A SUNSET AT SEA

From the "log" of Midshipman Harold E. Saunders, U. S. S. Iowa, by permission

WE sighted the Hebrides Islands, off the west coast of Scotland, at 2.06 this afternoon, and when I first saw them at 2.55 they must have been at least fifty-five miles away. 'Tis a wonderfully clear day, and I guess that accounts for our being able to see such a long distance. St. Kilda is dead ahead—or was, until I went up on deck just now. Must be forty miles off if it's a mile, and those rocks stick up there as big as if we were right down on top of them. We are to pass pretty close to them, it seems, and I'm going to stay up until we pass the island, about nine o'clock. This island of St. Kilda is at least forty miles off the Hebrides, and when you think that it stands there all alone with seventy-five fathoms of water around it, you can see that it must be the top of some Matterhorn of the Atlantic!

9.30 P.M. Just saw the most beautiful sunset that I ever saw at sea. You notice that I did not say it was the finest I ever saw, for that sunset on the fiord, the evening we came back from Finse—that was absolutely beyond man's power to describe. A half hour or so before we passed St. Kilda—around eight o'clock—all the people on deck swarmed over to the port rail so as to get a good view of the mighty rock. There seemed to be two parts to the island, or rather, two islands; the one to the southward looked something like half a dozen Helgolands thrown together in a heap—one mass of irregular rock, without a living thing on it but moss, so far as we could see. The northern island came up out of the water, sheer up, about 1,000 or 1,200 feet—there was no gently sloping shoreline on it.

Remember some of those old German cathedrals, with the hundreds of little sharp spires sticking up all around, and the two or three big ones that stuck way up into the air? Imagine, then, fifteen of these cathedrals inside of a volcano, and being melted into one jagged mass. All the thousands of little spires to make the hundreds of smaller spires on the big cathedral; all the hundreds of big spires to make the grand towers of the larger church. Then have your mighty bulk of stone gorged up through this volcano—pushed and squeezed and heated fiery hot, finally to come up off the west coast of Scotland, a jagged, pointed mass of rock; cold and desolate rock—that is St. Kilda.

To-night, however, our rocky island was a reddish bronze color—it might have been pure copper! And the sea was green. Tell me, have you ever seen a green sea at sunset? A long, flat bank of clouds was driving up from the southeast towards the setting sun, and the long, parallel curls of mist underneath showed that there was plenty of rain up there just waiting to come down.

Far off in the northwest were the last of the cumulus clouds that had been with us all day, and a great wide streak of blue sky, where the sun could give us the full strength of its light. Just as the sun's rays began to shoot upward, as it sank beneath the horizon, all our curly, wavy mist turned yellow; then a golden color, and then, as the sun sank farther and farther, a rich and gorgeous salmon. Half the sky glowed with this rich dark red—'twas a glare such as the fires of Hades might make in the height of their fury. Ships, islands, people — everything turned salmon color—no wonder, then, we said, there were salmon in this country.

Our strip of blue sky now turned a pea green—a delicate light green, such as the purest of green water might show. A cloud of mist far off beyond this horizon became a shore; our bank of clouds, slipping steadily over to the west, another shore; and soon we could see in this wonderful lake all the fiords of Norway, the islands of Killarney, and the shipping of the whole northern ocean.

'Twas all a moving panorama that swept by us like the changes of thousands of years. Islands melted into the shores, and new rocks shot up above the waters; square-rigged ships sailed on and on, until they passed out of view under the towering rocks, and all the while our marvelous revelation grew smaller and smaller; the fiendish red glare grew dimmer and dimmer, as the clouds drove across and the sun sank down, down, until our vision had vanished and we were left alone, appalled and subdued by the sight of Nature in her most magnificent form.

"OPEN TO ME!"

"OPEN to me!" I heard the thrilling prayer
In deepest dark of night, and life, and fate.
My hearth was black, my house was swept and bare;
My weary day had passed, the hour was late.
Yet One had come, and I had heard no sound
Of foot against the porch, no garment fold
Blown by the hurrying wind. On the hard ground
The frost was iron—and the world was cold!

"Open to me!" "Nay, I am poor," I said,
"And I have naught to give, nor food, nor fire."
"Open to me! Thou shalt not be afraid;
I ask for nothing—nothing I desire
Save at thy welcoming word to enter in;
To share thy poverty—the burden laid
Upon thy weariness. Nor shame nor sin
Are bolts to bar me out," the low voice prayed.

"Open to me! My path was set with thorns;
Sorrow and suffering kept pace with me;
I waked to anguish in the lonely morns;
I toiled through desert wastes, where terrors be;
My feet were bare upon the blistering stones;
The whirling wind beat on my unclothed breast;
I walked where misery was, and bitter moans:
Open to me, that I may, entering, rest!"

And did I grudging wait, nor turn the key,
Nor lift the bar that held my close-shut door?
Too poor of heart to share even poverty?
For friendly smile, and healing touch, too poor?
Had I no crumb to give, no meanest dole?
Could my lips find no faintest answering word
When, for the ransom of my outcast soul,
Thou camest to plead, my Saviour and my Lord?

PERKINS & CO. Lawrence, Kans.

Of course, Mr. Grocer, you are telling your customers about Heinz Mince Meat and Plum Pudding.

You are telling the housewife that the Heinz way is her own way of making mince meat.

We not only make it as good and clean as she makes it—but we have facilities—materials—that she cannot possess.

More than that, we have achieved a wonderful distinct flavor in Heinz Mince Meat.

Heinz Mince Meat is the very soul of good mince pies.

Every housewife knows how elusive a good mince meat flavor is. She may strike it one time and miss it the next. The delicious taste of Heinz Mince Meat is always the same.

And then, no home kitchen could be cleaner than the Heinz kitchens where it is made. The floors are clean. The walls are spotless. The workers are neatly uniformed.

Our apples are selected, pared, quartered and cored in the old-fashioned, housewifely way. Every bruised spot and blemish is rejected.

We send to Spain for raisins; the plump, full-flavored, four-crown Valencias. We wash and seed them carefully.

We use only the biggest and most luscious Grecian currants. They are inspected and given two washings.

We get our beef—choice cuts fresh every day—boil it ourselves. The white, rich, whole knob kidney suet is as good as it looks.

The candied fruits and peels are Leghorn importations. Our spices come from the Orient, whole. We grind them as we need them.

And everything in Heinz Mince Meat is so pure and so sound that Benzoate of Soda is not necessary to make it keep.

Explain that you can supply it in glass jars, in stone crocks or in Heinz Improved Tins—also by the pound from bulk packages.

You can also tell your customers that Heinz Plum Pudding is just as good as Heinz Mince Meat.

It, too, is made with finest raisins and currants, and generously filled with candied fruit. Like Heinz Mince Meat, it also forms a splendid, satisfying finish to a perfect meal.

And when you are selling Heinz products, don't forget to tell your customers that you willingly pay a little more in order to give them more quality for their money. It's only just to you that those who buy of you should know this.

And don't forget, Mr. Grocer, other seasonable Heinz delicacies—Tomato Soup, Cranberry Sauce, Preserves, Jellies, Sweet Pickles, etc., etc. Also Heinz Pure Vinegars.

THE SONG IN THE CABIN

By LULA DOWLER HARRIS

I WAS staying at a summer hotel in the mountains, trying to regain the strength I had lost while attending my father during a serious sickness.

This morning, as I walked through the village, I noted the quaint appearance of the place. Log houses everywhere, but all nicely whitewashed. Old-fashioned flowers bloomed everywhere. As I drew near the centre of town I heard some one singing. I stopped and listened. The voice was evidently that of an old lady who seemed to be just inside the door of the little cabin on my right. The singer's voice was high and shrill, but there was a certain pathos about it which affected me strangely. I could hear the words now clear and distinct:

He will hold me fast,
He will hold me fast,
For my Saviour loves me so,
He will hold me fast.

A longing took possession of me to see the singer. Opening the little gate, I contrived to form an excuse for my intrusion as I walked up the flower-bordered path. As the day was hot and sultry I thought it would not be out of place to ask for a glass of water.

Reaching the doorway, I saw seated in a low rocker a little white-haired woman diligently engaged in shelling beans. In her lap were piled the unshelled beans, while on the floor beside her chair stood a split basket to receive the hulls; on an unpainted chair in front of her was a wooden bowl more than one-half full of the speckled beauties.

As I paused a moment before rapping, my shadow fell across the bare clean floor and she looked up quickly, saying:

"Good morning, miss. Come right in."

Her voice and manner put me at my ease at once, and I asked her if she would kindly give me a drink of water. The water pail—a wooden one as white as the table on which it stood—was brim full of clear sparkling water.

"Certainly, my dear," and as she spoke she reached for a tin dipper which hung from a nail over the water bucket. The dipper was so bright my face was reflected as I drank.

"You certainly have a cozy little home here, madam, and I know by the way you were singing just now, you must be happy."

"This is a warm morning, miss; have a seat and rest awhile." I thanked her as I seated myself in a rocker, the exact duplicate of the one my hostess occupied.

"So you thought I must be happy because I was singing? Well, I am happy; but I often sing that hymn unconsciously. You are a stranger here, miss?"

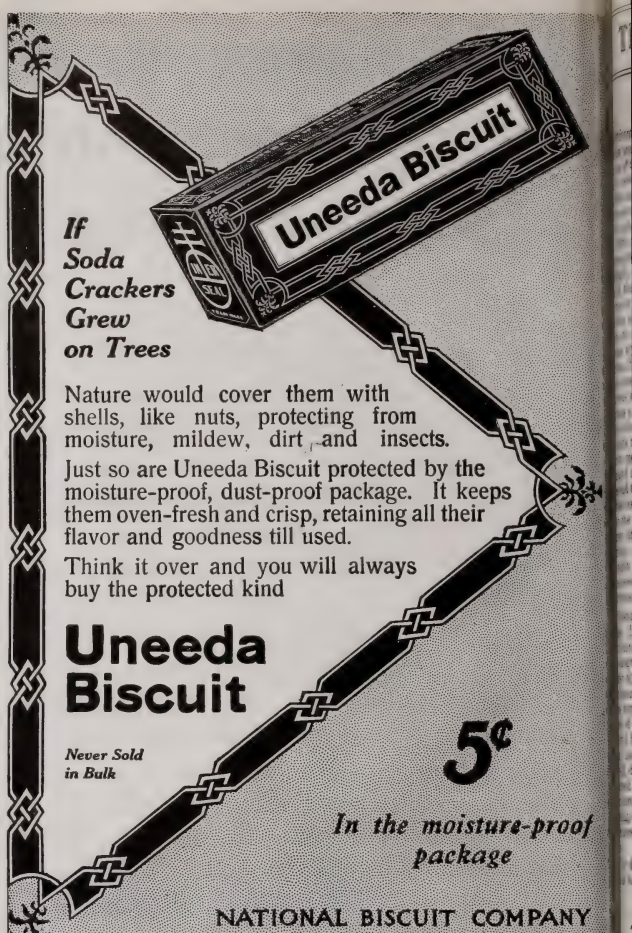
"Yes, I have never been in your little village but once before. I was taking a little stroll to fill in a few idle hours when I heard you singing. I stood and listened; then I wanted to see the singer, for your song had such a strain of confidence and contentment."

"Well, dear, you don't see much after all, do you? I am just an old woman who lives all alone but for my cat and chickens. I do love my little home, and I never close my eyes at night until I thank God for his goodness to me.

"Perhaps you have always had a home, dear, and do not know what it means to have no place you can call your own; but I have, and perhaps that is why I love it so. While you rest I will tell you how I came in possession of this little house and an acre of ground.

"About six years ago I lived with my daughter, who was married and lived on this same street farther up. She had a large family of children and we both worked very hard, until one day I was too ill to rise from my bed. I had a long spell of sickness. My daughter's husband did not make high wages, and I knew I was a great expense to them, and worried about it. One day I overheard my son-in-law say: 'Well, what can you expect? At her time of life she will always be a burden to some one.' Oh, how that hurt me!

"I lay there and prayed long and hard that God would show me a way to keep me from being a burden to any one. I had one son; poor lad, he was wayward, but had a good heart when he let drink alone. He had never helped support me (I was left a widow when my children were small). Indeed, I had often sent him money since he had gone away. It seemed he was often out of work. When he walked into my room the next morning looking so manly in his well-fitting garments, I felt somehow he was sent in answer to my prayers. He had plenty of money and bought me many delicacies and provided me with many needed comforts. He stayed two weeks and then said he must return, as the fires were being lighted in the furnaces of the mills where he was employed, and they would soon begin operations for the winter. I was almost well then, and my boy suggested I go with him and stay for the winter at least. He said we could do light housekeeping and the work would be easy for me. I accepted his invitation gladly, believing God was leading the way.



"My daughter said: 'Mother, you know how unreliable Edward has always been. I think you had better stay with us. You know if you are ill I am here to take care of you.' I told her I would go and see how he would do, and maybe I could help him to live right. Alice raised no further objections, and a week later Edward and I were nicely settled in two rooms near the mills. My son took me out a great deal, and all together we were quite happy.

"One day he came into the room, and handing me a roll of paper said: 'Mother, there is something to make you comfortable should anything happen to me.' I unrolled the paper and saw it was an insurance policy. I thanked him for his thoughtfulness, for I saw that I was named as the beneficiary. I added: 'I hope I may always have my boy, for he means more to me than five thousand dollars.' Edward and I often attended church together. He had a fine voice and enjoyed singing. I was proud of my boy. The hymn you heard me singing was a favorite of his.

"One evening at the close of a very impressive sermon, my boy, to the joy and comfort of my heart, gave his heart to God and consecrated his life to his service. After that my cup of happiness was full. I knew my footsteps were guided by an unseen power. But my happiness was of short duration. With the cold weather came my old ailment, and I was confined to my bed for six weeks. Help was inefficient and expensive, doctor's and drug bills were high. I saw my boy was discouraged. I tried to encourage him; but, my dear, it is hard to think or say comforting things when one is suffering great pain. Somehow I felt he was losing faith. One evening I asked him to sing for me; and complying with my wish, he sang his favorite: 'He will hold me fast.'

"He began staying out late at night—and sometimes he came home the worse for drink. I was grieved, and pleaded with him to let it alone. He finally lost his place in the mill. Those were dark days, dear; things went

"My dear, I never again expect to el as badly as I did when I packed my little trunk. Every garment I packed was damp with tears. I was turning the key in the lock when a rap at the door startled me. I found a man standing there with a telegram. 'Is this Mrs. B——?' he asked. I nodded, too frightened to speak. 'Sign here, please.' I could scarcely hold the pencil but managed to scribble my name. My son-in-law came to the door and I handed him the unopened telegram. He read words which told me my boy had been injured in a railroad wreck and had later died at the hospital. I felt myself slipping away then, I knew not where. I lay all night unconscious.

"Next day, a neighbor said there was a visitor wished to see me. The man came in and said: 'I feel very sorry for you.' Then he drew a paper from his pocket, which showed that my boy had been insured for $5,000 and had named me as beneficiary in the policy. Some time afterward, the minister who was by his side when he passed away, came and delivered a message Edward had sent me. Here it is, dear, read it for yourself." And she drew a piece of paper from the bosom of her dress. I read the following:

"'MOTHER: I wandered away from the Saviour, but I feel his presence now, and as I go down into the valley I know that he will hold me fast.

"'EDWARD.'

"These words are a great comfort to me," she added with a smile. "I know my children are waiting for me over there. I bought this little home with Edward's gift and I thank God continually for letting me have such comforts. I have not been ill for many a long day. I have kept you longer than you wished to stay; but I like to tell people my story, for they may have dark days sometimes and it may help them to hold fast, for He will surely bring them through if they trust in him."

The Gospel for Street Waifs

HE Evangelistic Committee of New York City during the past season creased still further its efforts of evious years to gather the "children the streets" for religious instruc- n. From 10,000 to 12,000 children sembled each week of the summer ason in tents or open air classes. n nationalities were represented at e meetings. In many locations the nt was recognized as an old friend d the children rushed eagerly to the etings as soon as open. In other ctions showers of rocks and stones om "gangs" of boys and girls de- ended upon the canvas roof for the st few evenings. Soon, however, the fenders ceased their opposition and most without exception were found the tents as regular attendants at e nightly sessions, with the former ng-leaders acting perhaps as ushers assistant caretakers in the very nts they once assailed.

At the close of the past season, arly 2,000 boys and girls assembled one of the largest churches of the ty to unite in a programme of song d recitation.

"Not many boys in American urches know the Bible as these boys nor understand so clearly what it eans to be a Christian," said one who d been studying the methods of the mmittee.

The New York Evangelistic Com- ittee finds the foreign work one of e most encouraging branches of its ndertakings. During the past sum- er, services were held in Italian, candinavian, Bohemian, Finnish, wedish, German, Russian, Spanish, ovak and Greek, in addition to the rvices in English for negroes as well for whites. Meetings were held in nts, in shops, or in the open air. Day after day, throughout the summer, men and women spoke and sang in the suffocating heat of the shop or under the blazing sun of a midsummer sky. Again, at sunset or under the stars, at the street corner, in the park, or at the pleasure resort, the wayfarer might come unexpectedly upon a man preaching from a box which served for pulpit and platform. In the evening there were crowded tents in various sections where, after the children's meeting, services were held for men and women. Beginning in 1905 with thirteen centres, the tent, open air and shop campaigns of the Evangelistic Committee of New York City covered ninety-nine centres in 1911. There were held 1,844 meetings with an attendance of over 323,000. Of these meetings, 385 were for boys and girls, with an attendance of over 80,000. In several sections, churches opened doors and welcomed the evangelists and corps of helpers, especially for meetings for children and for big boys.

Dr. Arthur J. Smith, superintendent of the work, at the Carnegie Hall rally stated that in "Little Italy" there are about 85,000 Italians, nominally Catholics, yet in that section there are only three Catholic churches. Of the 1,000,000 Jews in the city, it is said that only 50,000 are identified with synagogues. Among Protestants, there are nearly 1,000,000 who do not attend church. It is these neglected, overlooked, or indifferent classes of non-churchgoers that the Evangelistic Committee seeks. Sect and creed are not promulgated. No attempt is made to proselyte. A loving heavenly Father, a Christ who saves from sin and death, a life of decency and purity here on earth and a future life beyond—these are the truths presented.

Peace and Blessing*

THE great fault with all of us is that we so often allow some one or two annoyances and trials to blot from our minds the far greater mercies of our lot. This seems to be inherent in human nature—an almost universal trait. Let us, if we have never hitherto waged warfare against it, begin with this Thanksgiving Day. Let us remember Archbishop Trench's lines (in which he might almost as well have substituted "all" for this first "some"):

Some murmur when their sky is clear
And wholly bright to view,
If one small speck of dark appear
In their great heaven of blue:
And some with thankful love are filled
If but one streak of light,
One ray of God's good mercy, gild
The darkness of their night.

An especial subject for thankfulness at this season is the great progress which has been made among English-speaking peoples toward the abolition of war. Certain writers have maintained that war is the best state in which man can exist, and that times of peace are given us merely in order that we may catch our breath, as it were, and gather strength for another campaign; and perhaps these writers are not far out of the way. Men do love to fight, and they love to see others fight; but, as the Rev. Jonathan Brierly has lately said, there are many ways of fighting.

For instance, look at the battle which we have fought with yellow fever, and, at the cost of some of our noblest lives, have virtually won. There was a fight which was worth while. So was Jenner's fight with smallpox. So was the fight which Pasteur waged with hydrophobia; and so is that of Flexner with cerebro-spinal meningitis. When all these battles are fairly won, how thankful will the whole world be!

Then there are the fights which man has to wage with wild beasts and poisonous insects—the tiger, the leopard, the rattlesnake, and the lion, which destroy hundreds of lives yearly in different parts of the world; and with the scorpion and the mosquito and the million other creeping and flying pests, which not only mar human peace, but endanger health and life. These are still to be overcome, and strong arms, clear heads, and united efforts are necessary for the world-wide conflict.

Instead of trying to kill each other, argues Mr. Brierly, why not aim our guns skilfully at Mother Earth, and with them turn wildernesses into blooming and fruitful fields; our swamps into fertile wheat lands; tunneling our mountains, irrigating our deserts, building roads through the vast, pathless tracts, and bringing men into closer relations of friendliness and brotherhood?

It is a grand dream, and that our great Anglo-Saxon race is taking the first steps toward its realization is cause for profoundest gratitude. Mr. Alfred Noyes, in commenting upon the proposed arbitration pact between Great Britain and America, writes:

They sundered. But how mightily they meet!
Hark! o'er three thousand miles of sea they greet.

The first gleam of the nobler years to be.
They stand together in the morning light,
Here in the vanguard of humanity,
Shaking the heart of Chaos and Old Night
With one harmonious word—peace and goodwill.

In this great movement, which involves not only the individual interests of every home, but the political fortunes of every State and the well-being of the whole republic, every member of our beloved society should endeavor (the word is used advisedly) to take an active part. Speak of it often among your friends and in your public gatherings, and, if possible, join and promote the interests of one of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Peace Circles.

Home Missions*

PROFESSOR AUSTIN PHELPS said a quarter of a century ago that we were then at a crisis in the destiny of this country, and through it, in the destiny of the world. That crisis is not yet passed. In unprecedented numbers, immigrants from the poor and oppressed countries are flocking to America.

Nearly all of these scores and hundreds of thousands of poor people are illiterate. Very few of them know anything of the Christian religion, though a certain type of Jew is coming in constantly increasing numbers. Many remain in the East to pick up an uncertain livelihood in our great coast cities. Some move westward; and of a better class than are now coming to us Lyman Beecher and William Blackburn wrote, after traveling in the West half a century ago, that our nation was destined to go down before the infidel forces which were being injected into the body politic through these hordes of foreign immigrants. As time has progressed we have maintained what the great Burke called "a perilous and dancing balance" between the forces of American religionism and this imported foreign atheism. The balance does not yet strongly incline to the right side. We Christians should make it do so; as the Methodist is one of the most splendidly daring among all the evangelical denominations, it behooves us who are Methodists to push the campaign into the West, where the need is greatest.

In the South, too, the battle is raging with dangerous fury, and it is perhaps in the South that our equipment and spirit are best adapted for conquest. Especially should our young society interest itself in the holding of Christ's fort among the warring factions of these desperate enemies. To save our beloved land for the Lord Jesus should be a main object of our prayers and our efforts.

In Dr. Josiah Strong's wonderful book, Our Country, the case is set forth with startling vividness. Though many years have elapsed since this masterly work rang out its clarion-cry for the salvation of America, it is still almost as effective as ever.

But it is not in the West alone that there is need of missionary effort. Those of you who ride on the railroads or on automobiles through the country are doubtless pained to see that even the smaller towns and cities have their "slum" districts, where frowzy children, bedraggled women and staggering, unkempt men haunt the streets. Nearly every one of you has in your own town such a field for missionary effort. More tact and skill may be needed to administer aid and uplift there than in some more distant spot, but it is your duty to provide for the degraded and down-trodden at home quite as much as for those who are hundreds of miles away.

In Mr. Ward Platt's interesting work, The Frontier, he reminds us of a fact too often lost sight of. This is that by filling these vast United States with Christians, we virtually make easier and surer the conversion of the Orient, since from our Western coast Asia is so readily accessible. In glowing words he paints the tremendous resources of our almost limitless commonwealths, and calls passionately upon the whole country for funds and men to carry thither the saving Gospel. In the rush of our complicated modern life, the craze for wealth, this cry of the wild, unchurched spaces on the frontier sounds sometimes very faint in our ears. Let us turn away from our selfish pursuits and search for ways in which we can help to win for Christ these strategic points of vantage in the West.

Brander Cushing's Ambition

"ere's a way out. We'll go down to t: yard together."

When the two came out of the ı ise, there stood a group of news- ˙per men waiting for them.

Brander Cushing walked straight t and was out on the sidewalk before ı: of the reporters spoke.

"You might as well talk, Mr. ushing. You'll have to, you know, ner or later."

"I won't talk here. I told you I uldn't. Down at the office."

The group of newspaper men con- ued to follow. To all their ques- ns Cushing answered never a word. mended his pace, Sidney striding ng by him. The reporters found it t fastest walking they ever knew. o or three stayed by, but the rest shed to the trolley and made for the ipyard.

When the two arrived they found ne of the newspaper group awaiting m.

Brander Cushing told Sidney to go to the draughting room, and went mself into his office, where he faced e entire party of reporters, now in- eased in number to seven.

"I take it the same statements will swer for all of you boys. What do u want to know?"

"About the proposed indictment by e grand jury. What have you to y?"

"Nothing."

Pause.

"Fleming says he will push the in- stigation to the limit. Your com- ny owned the factory?"

"We are the sole owners."

"The about those fire-escapes?"

"They had been ordered."

"But not constructed. How about e marshal's notice?"

"I never received any."

Blank stare of real surprise from e newspaper crowd.

Pencils worked fast.

"You mean—"

"The marshal never served any no- ce. It was my own initiative to put e escapes on the building and the ork was to commence this week. I n't mind showing you my memoran- m on it."

Brander Cushing went to his office fe, opened it, took out a box, took a af of papers from it and handed e over to the reporter who had been okesman for the others.

The document went from hand to and. It was the same he had men- oned to Sidney.

"My great regret is that my orders ere not carried out, and loss of life as the result. No one can regret this ore than myself. The company will ake every compensation possible. e do not feel responsible for the fire. occurred from a leaky gas main."

"The people who lost relatives and riends are very much determined to ring somebody to time for the affair. ome one must be punished. What do ou say about Fleming's attitude?"

"I prefer not to discuss it."

"Fleming says he will bring every- hing to bear to get the grand jury to ring indictments."

Silence on Brander Cushing's part. He had made up his mind not to say word about Fleming, no matter hat happened.

After a few unimportant queries he reporters went away, taking with hem, as the most vital part of their nterview, a copy of the memorandum nade by Cushing ordering the build- ng of the fire-escapes on the factory.

To every man of affairs, at some ime or other, there comes a special nd critical period of testing. Every nan who has ever made any chapter f life has had his temptation, and his defeat or victory. From it he comes either in the power of the Spirit to turn the world upside down, or he slinks back into the desert a defeated and lost soul.

Brander Cushing now stood at such a parting of the ways.

For fifty-six years he had lived what would be called an exemplary business life; that is to say, he had lived according to the code into which he was born. As a matter of fact, the corporation which supplied the material he dealt with, and in which he was a large factor, was the most gigantic combination of selfish purposes the world has ever seen. But personally, Brander Cushing was the soul of honor up to this time in his life. He was not individually a liar or a thief. His word in the business world was a synonym for honesty and probity. He had a scorn that was high bred for small vices. He was a gentleman of repute. He was a man of deep self-respect.

Yet as he closed the office door on the newspaper men, and then went back and sat down by his desk, he realized that a crisis had swiftly come in his own character. In other words, he had committed himself to a course which might spell for him disgrace in the eyes of the public, and worse than that, disgrace in the sight of his son.

He rapidly went over the steps that had led him to his present position.

1. The marshal's notice had been legally served on him ten days before he had made the memorandum he had shown the reporters.

2. But his knowledge of affairs in the marshal's office had led him to believe that no record of such notice was on file with the fire department, which had, under the present management, been run on very loose lines. This guess on his part had been made a certainty by investigation on his way home from the scene of the fire the day before. He had gone up to the headquarters. Only a clerk or two remained in the room of the records. It was not difficult to ascertain, as he turned over the books, that in all probability the record of such notice had not been kept. He was a shrewd business man, but he was risking his case largely on that failure.

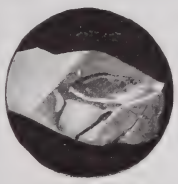
3. A deputy had served the paper. Only himself and Sidney were present in the office when it occurred.

4. In a contest between his word and that of a deputy fire marshal there could be no question as to results.

5. The crucial point with him now was the fact that the notice had been served when his son was present, and he had already mentioned this to him.

6. But—and here he found himself on the thin edge of self-distrust—Sidney had been, all his life long, trained to habits of implicit faith in his father. He had never once questioned that iron will and determination which had brought Brander Cushing up from the obscure place of a black-faced, grimy foundry boy to the proud position of head of the greatest shipyard in the United States.

7. The question now rose, would this lifelong habit of obedience result in silence on Sidney's part in face of such denial of an incriminating fact?



8. In doubt over this, it was imperative that he should be absent during the time of the grand jury's sitting and findings.

9. How to accomplish the seemingly impossible in the face of a modern world of universal news dissemination and knowledge was now one of the foremost thoughts of Brander Cushing.

10. But he recalled the fact that Sidney had a unique scorn of newspapers. He rarely read them. He was singular, as a young man, in his contempt of daily gossip. It was no unusual thing for his father to read the main news aloud as the two sipped their coffee at breakfast, and then to his father's positive knowledge Sidney never so much as glanced at a daily again.

Cooking in Paper Bags Explained

Send for FREE Samples

It's good-bye to greasy pans and kettles, now that you can cook things better, quicker, in fresh, germ-proof paper bags, made especially for the purpose---Union Cookery Bags.

Knowing that food cooked enclosed in paper gains much in deliciousness and tenderness, the best known chefs of Europe have tried for years to overcome the one difficulty---to find a paper which would not impart its taste to the food. This has at last been accomplished by Nicholas Soyer, the noted English chef, and Union Cookery Bags of this paper are now being made exclusively by us for the use of American housewives. The use of means not only more delicious food, but a vast saving of time, labor and expense. They prevent practically all shrinkage of the food and loss of flavor---no smell of cooking in the house. Inexpensive and marvelously simple to use. Throw them away afterward. No washing of greasy cooking utensils.

UNION Cookery Bags

Union Cookery Bags are used for stews, vegetables, puddings, roasts, entrees---everything except soups and beverages may be cooked in these bags.

Prepare food as usual for cooking and place in the Union Bag, close the end tight and slide into the oven. Nothing more needed until the necessary time for cooking has elapsed. Then draw out the bag on to a plate and rip open the top. The food will be perfectly cooked, with none of its richness or flavor lost. Meats wonderfully tender.

But—don't try to cook in ordinary paper bags — they will spoil the food. Be sure you have genuine Union Cookery Bags bearing this mark.

TRADE MARK UNION Cookery Bags

This bag is made from material that guarantees purity. It is odorless and tasteless, moisture-proof, germ-proof, unaffected by heat. Being air-tight, none of the richness and flavor of food can evaporate into the oven. Self-basting and self-browning. There's a size for every cooking use.

Union Cookery Bags are made in all needed sizes and are put up in liberal 25c sanitary packages.

"Who Is My Neighbor?"

OUR Saviour was at Capernaum, having just sent out the seventy disciples to preach the Gospel, when a noted lawyer asked, "Master, what shall I do to inherit eternal life?" Our Saviour answered with a question: "What is written in the law? How readest thou?" The lawyer, answering, said: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind, and thy neighbor as thyself." And Jesus said: "Thou hast answered right: this do and thou shalt live." But the smart lawyer, wishing to display his skill before the crowd of friends and citizens, inquired: "And who is my neighbor?"

Addressing the entire assembly the Saviour answered with the descriptive parable of the Good Samaritan; but he does not omit at its conclusion to address himself directly to the young lawyer by asking: "Which now was neighbor to him that fell among thieves?" The crowd is awed into silence, forcing the young lawyer to answer, "Why, he that showed mercy on him." Then said Jesus, "Go and do thou likewise."

There is no mention made of Capernaum in the Old Testament, and probably it was not built till after the return from the Babylonish captivity. The word means "Field of Pleasure," and, according to Josephus, it derived its name from an adjacent spring. Capernaum was greatly favored by nature, but was also the subject of many denunciations of divine wrath. These have been fulfilled upon the city, and its very site is to-day unknown.

Let us imagine ourselves on the shore of the Sea of Galilee, where Christ called to the apostleship Peter, Andrew, James and John, fishermen of Bethsaida, and a little later Matthew, who was the collector of fares for crossing the lake. How our Saviour loved this city is proven by Matthew, who calls it "His own city." It is here that he so often resorted after the commencement of his public ministry, and he favored it with his ablest discourses, including the Sermon on the Mount. Here, too, he did some of his most wonderful miracles. His loving companionship with John was always a sweet memory linked with Capernaum. We can imagine that wonderful friendship, with the many hours they spent on the shore of the lake together, where no doubt our Saviour taught his favorite disciple the wonderful mysteries of his divine mission. The results of these teachings are recorded by the evangelist, clearly showing that he understood the import of the Saviour's question—"Who is my neighbor?"

How many are the opportunities given us in our every-day life to know who is our neighbor! Surely not one of us can say we know not our neighbor. Day after day, in our business and our domestic life, we find those who have met with financial misfortunes, sickness, or even the loss of dear ones. Do we help them to overcome these losses, or to ease the trials that beset them? Many a word of sympathy has touched a mother's heart and helped her bear her sad loss. Many a kind word and silent handshake (when the tongue could not speak) have put loving thoughts into the heart of a wayward girl or boy, and new ambition into a man almost overcome by business misfortunes. Never for a moment let us underestimate the trials and misfortunes of others; they may be sent for some wise purpose, possibly to prove us and to see if we will know who is our neighbor.

Bad habits often increase where, if a kind word or a helping hand had been extended, they might have been checked and with God's help entirely overcome. I once knew a young man who had become a drunkard. He said, "I had no mother or sister to show me my error, and no one ever spoke to me about it; so I went on, from bad to worse, until to-day I'm a wreck, and I can't stop it." The case was a very sad one. In the great city he met hundreds of men in business, yet not one knew that this young man was his neighbor!

God grant that when the opportunity is presented to us, we may remember the teaching of our Saviour, and, knowing our neighbor, help him to the full extent of our ability.

C. GODWIN TURNER.

Brander Cushing's Ambition

11. There was, to be sure, the ever present risk of what people might say. How could plain facts in such a case as this ever be kept from the knowledge of his son?

12. But—and here was his desperate running of chances as he had swiftly made them for himself—under any and all conditions the acknowledgment of the receipt of the marshal's notice spelled almost certain indictment for him. He was shrewd enough to know that under the popular feeling, with a powerful and hostile man like Fleming, an old political enemy, to give the feeling direction, even the wealth and influence of such a firm as his could not and would not prevent a verdict from the grand jury that would be fatal to him. At any risk he must save himself. And again and again the one weak point in it all was the legal point that he had been duly served, and had refused to act. If he could by any means show the public that he was not guilty of negligence he believed he could trust to the reaction of public censure and escape.

13. The law was an absurdity. He struck his hand with passion on his desk, as he cursed a statute that had been passed by a so-called reform legislature in a spasm of righteousness just after a similar horror to this which had so suddenly become a part of his own history.

14. He had not meant to involve himself in such a situation. It was simply maddening. He, Brander Cushing, stern, cold, self-contained, successful business man, with a reputation for general steadiness of purpose, driven like a child into a lie for fear of punishment—it seemed like a vile nightmare, a thing he once—yes, less than eight hours ago—would have laughed at as impossible. But—Sidney! Ah! There was, after all, his one great fear—

"Thirty-six" Touring Car 5-passenger,—$1800
Long stroke motor, Chalmers self-starter, four forward speeds, Bosch dual ignition, Solar gas lamps and Prest-O-Lite tank, ventilated fore-doors, 36x4-inch tires, Continental demountable rims

You Buy a Chalmers Car "Worth the Money"

FIFTEEN thousand satisfied owners furnish proof that in buying a Chalmers you buy a car worth the money.

Utmost value at the price—one price to all—and service guaranteed is the Chalmers policy. We have been unable to find any brand of salesmanship equal to quality in the goods, or any sort of advertising one-half so effective as good words spoken by those who know the merit of Chalmers cars.

The Chalmers "30" holds the world's speed record for cars of its class. It holds the national reliability record—winning the Clidden Tour of 1910—the hardest motor contest ever held.

Last year the Chalmers "30," fully equipped, cost $1750. This year, with the 1912 improvements, equipped with thoroughly ventilated fore-door bodies, inside control magneto, gas lamps, Prest-O-Lite tank, including also Chalmers mohair top and automatic windshield, it is offered at $1500!

The Chalmers "30" has always been noted for excellence of design; grace of line; beauty of finish. But it has been the sturdiness of its motor and transmission, the strength in its wheels and frame, its all-around durability that has counted most in maintaining its leadership in its class.

In addition to the Chalmers "30" this season, we offer the new model "Thirty-six" at $1800. This car represents a development along the line of increased size and power.

We ask you to compare the "Thirty-six" with any 5-passenger car at any price. Motor gives 40 h. p. in tests; four forward speed transmission; Chalmers self-starter; demountable rims; finished like the costliest cars; thoroughly proved.

We believe no one more than the farmer knows that quality means economy. Every successful farmer has learned this from his experience with farm machinery.

What is true of the binder, the reaper, or the threshing machine is doubly true of the latest and greatest machine yet invented for farm use—the practical automobile.

When you buy a Chalmers you discount the first cost by its known durability. It is always "Guaranteed Sound."

We ask you to inspect the new Chalmers cars at our dealer's. A postal card or letter will give you our new catalog and any further information you may desire on Chalmers cars.

RUSSIA'S NEW PREMIER

THE new Russian premier, Vladimir Nikolaievitch Kokovtsof, has long been prominent in Russian administration, yet the nature of his work has been such that no final estimate can be made of his probable attitude in his new position. He is descended from an old Russian family, and was born in 1847. His higher education was completed in the Imperial Alexandrofski Lyceum, of St. Petersburg, and he began his public career as an attaché of the council of the empire after a short term as assistant to the chief of the prison administration. Economic and financial problems absorbed the interest of young Kokovtsof, and after a rapid advancement to the general secretaryship of the council he was appointed associate minister of finance under Count Witte. Here he showed great ability and in 1904 succeeded Witte as minister of finance, when the latter became president of the council of ministers. One of the greatest successes of his career was scored during the Russo-Japanese War, when, in a period of less than fifteen months, by foreign and domestic loans, he raised a sum equal to $665,000,000 at a low rate of interest. Duties as minister of finance have kept him out of the problem of bettering the economic conditions of the agricultural peasantry.

He is said to be more liberal than Stolypin was, however. In support of this opinion the Outlook says: "In his political views Kokovtsof is believed to be more liberal and tolerant than Stolypin was. . . . He is susceptible, moreover, to influences and considerations that hardly affected his predecessor at all. Stolypin did not care much for the approval or disapproval of the outside world, and pursued his 'blood-and-iron' policy of repression regardless of foreign opinion. Kokovtsof, on the contrary, as minister of finance, has been forced to take that opinion into account, because he had to borrow large sums of money abroad in order to meet Russia's urgent financial needs. Public opinion in western Europe [liberal], therefore, is likely to affect his administration more than it affected the administration of Stolypin. . . . Kokovtsof never wholly approved the nationalizing policy which Stolypin favored . . . and he is likely to assume a much more tolerant and conciliatory attitude toward the Finns and the Poles—and possibly the Jews—than that taken by his predecessor after the suppression of the revolutionary movement. His accession to power is generally regarded in Russia as a change for the better. The new premier, however, is a conservative and a monarchist, rather than a liberal. . . . The greatest boon that the new premier could confer upon the people would be the complete and final abolition of government by martial law; but it is doubtful whether he would have power to bring it about even if he favored it. The higher bureaucratic officials of Russia have ruled for more than thirty years by means of martial law, and have become so accustomed to the free exercise of discretionary power that they would find it difficult so to change their methods as to make them conform to the provisions of the civil code."

Plans for Winter Window-Boxes

By Ida D. Bennett

THE winter window-box is more of a problem than that devoted to out-door use in summer, when all things conspire to aid in the growth and development of the plants consigned to their fostering care. The winter window-garden has, first of all, to contend with a lack of fresh air—a serious deficit. Then there is the ever-present dust, especially where the house is furnace-heated. Steam heat does not present this objection, as there is nothing about it to set the dust in circulation and keep it in more or less constant motion; but the hot air rushing up through the registers, and displacing the cooler air in the room, stirs up every particle of dust and deposits it in considerable quantities upon the plants. The dryness of the atmosphere is not of moment where a well-arranged furnace is used; the best makes now have the water-pan, which is of very generous size, in the front of the furnace and resting directly against the firepot, so that with any kind of a fire the water is at boiling point most of the time, and sending up clouds of steam to temper the atmosphere, so that plants are very well cared for in this respect. But the matter of dust remains, and plants to do well in the living-room must be selected with an eye to their ability to withstand it. Hard, glossy-leaved plants are not greatly injured by dust and are easily cleaned and washed off, but begonias of the ornamental Rex varieties, cinnerarias, calseolarias, and the like, should not be undertaken unless they can be protected in some way.

I have found that a plant which I was unable to grow at all in a furnace-heated house would do finely in the window-box by merely leaning a pane of window-glass over it from the outer side of the window-box to the window above it; the little, shriveled leaves giving place in a very short time to great, luxuriant leaves of the richest coloring.

A few plants in a well-arranged window-box are both ornamental and a pleasure; a number crowded together in an inadequate space are neither.

The most convenient box for the window is a narrow one just large enough to sit on the sill without danger of tipping over; or, if a shelf extends below the window, a larger one may be used. But I find these narrow boxes, only wide enough to hold one row of plants, very convenient; these may be made to match the woodwork, and a pretty finish is to run a strip of picture railing across the bottom in front and as far across the ends as the box projects; this is especially pretty when the boxes are painted white. The boxes should be lined with zinc in the bottom and for an inch or more, at least, up the sides, and the plants may be planted directly in the boxes or left in the pots and set in the boxes, and the space between filled either with sand or sphagnum moss, or left empty. I prefer to set the plants in in their pots, as the plants may then be turned about, and if attacked with insects may be taken out for treatment.

To secure the best effect, only one variety of plant should be grown in the same box; a primrose window, for instance, is delightful, and a north-window box filled with red and white primroses will be a joy all winter; or an east window may be used for this flower, while carnations and heliotropes will find a congenial home in sunny south windows.

If one can arrange a slight shelf under a north window, and arrange a box of Rex begonias, and have a glass cut wide enough to cover the box and reach up to the top of the lower sash, one may enjoy begonias as fine as ever grew in a green-house. Where the box simply rests upon the front of the sill it exerts a considerable degree of pressure, and the box would not be safe if it projected much beyond the window-sill; hence the need of a shelf. A good way to secure the permanence of the arrangement would be to have the glass fitted into a very light frame and hinged to the upper part of the sash; this does away with the weight on the box and all danger of breaking the glass when removing it to water the plants. The opening at the ends admits the necessary heat and air.

A Pretty Window-Box of Foliage and Blossoms

Many old housekeepers have, stored away somewhere in the attic, a few old window cornices, so popular in the seventies and eighties; these were usually handsomely made of expensive wood, and so have escaped destruction. I have found that a good way to utilize them, especially when they happen to match the woodwork of the room, is to turn them wide side up and attach them to the wall just below the window-sill by means of hooked rods screwed into the wall. A piece of wood finished to match the cornice is then fitted into the cornice and window-sill, and, presto! a swell window-shelf. Or the cornice may be turned broad side down and fitted with a zinc lining, and will furnish a very presentable window-box. Of course if used just as it stands it will have but a front and two ends, but as these are all that will show from the room it is really all that is necessary, and the zinc lining, which is all that shows from the outside, may be neatly painted to match the outside of the sash. If the frames are too large to fit into the window, as they probably will be, they may rest on brackets just below it; this permits of the shades being drawn down back of the boxes on cold nights.

Generally speaking, the west windows are not congenial locations in which to grow plants, but there is usually something which will grow there and do well; geraniums, which are not particular plants in any sense, may be trusted to a west window, but prefer a south exposure. Still one of the finest Baby primroses I ever grew sat all winter in a west window, and was a mass of bloom all winter through; furthermore, this same primrose bloomed all the preceding winter in a north window, and all summer in an outside window-box.

These narrow window-boxes are charming for placing of winter-blooming bulbs, such as hyacinth, narcissus and the like, and as one may easily have a succession of these in bloom they are ever changing, ever new.

The Bombayreed jardinières are now produced in window-box form and should be a real acquisition to the flower-lover; they are certainly very attractive and practical as jardinières; these are now produced in split form, so that they may be slipped around instead of over or under a plant; this in the case of such spiny plants as the phœnix palms and cacti, which are so unpleasant and difficult to handle, would be vastly convenient.

Vines are not especially desirable in the winter window-box, as they must trail over the front of the box and away from the light, and are apt to grow straggly and sickly looking. In hanging baskets, vines are satisfactory if abundantly supplied with water and the basket is turned frequently so that they may make a symmetrical growth.

The executive committee of the trustees have requested Dr. Eliot to make this journey with the purpose of explaining the organization and aims of the endowment in the various Asiatic countries, of studying the public opinion of those countries, particularly as relates to matters of international concern, and of procuring material for a report upon what activities may wisely and helpfully be planned by the Carnegie Endowment for the several Asiatic nations with a view to promoting the cause of peace and international good will. An important part of Dr. Eliot's work will lie in Japan, which he expects to reach early in April, 1912. Dr. Eliot will return to the United States in July next.

A Tulip Garden From Holland

Imported Especially for Christian Herald Subscribers

Tulips, Hyacinths, Narcissus, Oxalis, Lilies

These plants which we offer yield the most fragrant and gorgeously brilliant flowers that can be produced from bulbs. They are the choicest gems from the famous Tulip Gardens of Holland. Their culture is extremely easy, requiring no special attention, as it is always a foregone conclusion that successful blooming will surely follow their planting. We have made it possible for our subscribers to secure this magnificent collection of thirty-five of the most popular bulbs grown, consisting of six varieties. They are all matured bulbs, and will produce a gorgeous display of flowers in from eight to ten weeks, after planting. Very artistic effects can be obtained by growing them in glass dishes with different colored bits of rock, glass, and gravel, or they may be grown in window-boxes, and will thus delight both those indoors and out.

For Indoor Winter Blooming

You can have your own Tulip Garden, imported direct from Holland, blooming in your home during this coming winter. We have contracted for thousands of Holland tulip, hyacinth, crocus, snowdrop, oxalis and narcissus bulbs which we hope to place in the homes of our subscribers during November and December, for pot planting and growing indoors. These perfectly hardy bulbs have been selected with the double idea of having bulbs which it would be possible to bring to bloom during the winter or else keep through the winter for fall or spring planting and bringing into bloom in the garden. Directions for planting accompany each collection.

NOTE.—Our Premium List has been mailed to all our subscribers, and if you have not received yours by November 20 notify us by postcard and we will send you a duplicate copy.

These Beautiful Lilies For Christmas

The Easter Lily is the peerless Harrisii variety, which is certain to produce a profusion of blooms. The ease with which it can be made to flower at any desired period, such as Christmas, Easter and other special occasions, renders this Lily invaluable and extremely popular.

The Lily of the Valley is one of the most delicately fragrant flowers that grows. In four or five weeks from potting it will come into a profusion of blossoms which will give a delightful fragrance, filling the entire house with its odor. The Chinese Sacred Lily, or Water Fairy Flower, as it is called by the Celestials, bears a lavish profusion of flowers of a silvery whiteness, with large golden yellow cups of exquisite beauty and entrancing perfume. It will bloom in five or six weeks after planting, growing very rapidly, so that you can "almost see it grow." The Giant Golden Sacred Lily is of almost the same variety except that it is of a deep golden yellow, making a splendid contrast with the white bloom of the Chinese Sacred Lily. Both these bulbs can be grown in the same pot, making a charming combination for house culture, both growing either in water or in a light loam soil. This collection consists of one Easter Lily, five Lilies of the Valley, one Chinese Sacred Lily and one Golden Sacred Lily.

We will send the Lily bulbs, as described, postpaid, with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year and our new 1912 Almanac—all for only . . $2.00

You may have just such flowers as these in your home this winter

Thirty-five Bulbs of Gorgeous Flowers

The collection of thirty-five bulbs, which we offer our subscribers, consists of three hyacinths, five tulips, ten crocuses, five snowdrops, ten oxalis and two narcissus. The fragrance and rich color of the hyacinth makes it an especial favorite for indoor growing during the winter. It can be grown either in soil or in vases of water. The tulips have always been the friendly companions of the hyacinth, and where one is grown, usually the other may be found. The extreme ease of their culture, combined with their great beauty of form and the wide diversity of shades and gorgeous coloring, render them incomparable for window garden and indoor pot-blooming. The crocus, snowdrop and oxalis are all smaller bulbs than the hyacinth and tulip, and produce flowers of sprightly daintiness and great profusion in beautiful groups. They all stay in bloom for a considerable length of time, and if potted with some interval between each, you can have blooms from some of your bulbs throughout the entire winter. The narcissus is a favorite everywhere. When once it is well established outdoors, it will need no further care for several years, and with each year the bulb-clumps will multiply in strength and beauty, until the blooms can be gathered in endless quantities. It can be brought to flower in the winter.

We will send you postpaid the above described collection of 35 bulbs with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year and our new 1912 Almanac—all for $2.00

Questions and Answers

Mrs. M. T., San Diego, Calif. How long did Lazarus live after Christ raised him from the dead?

There are no authoritative data on the subject. An old tradition, mentioned by Epiphanius, says that Lazarus was thirty years old when restored from death and that he lived thirty years thereafter. Still another tradition declares that he traveled to Southern Europe, accompanied by Mary and Martha, and preached the Gospel in Marseilles. (There is no such book as that mentioned in your letter.)

A. S., Washington, D. C. In Matt. 8: 28-32, we read that two men met Jesus, and when he was about to cast the evil spirits out of the men, they begged to be permitted to enter into a herd of swine; in Mark 5: 2-13 we read that one man met Christ, and in Luke 8: 27-33 we read the same account again, as I suppose. What lesson can we learn from this incident? These hogs must have been valuable to the owner or owners, and the Saviour was not disposed to injure any one, either in person or property; yet here it would appear that several thousand dollars' worth of property had been swept away in a very short time, and without any apparent reason.

It is assumed by commentators that an explanation of the incident is to be found in the fact that the owners of the swine were Hebrews. If this were so, then they drove an illegal trade in unclean animals, not sanctioned by their national laws. If they were not Jews but heathen, then their calling was offensive and an insult to the Jewish national religion. In either case, from this point of view, the permission granted to the evil spirits to enter the herd would be justified. It is noticeable that the owners made no complaint of valuable property lost, which would doubtless have been the case if they had not felt properly punished.

Reader, Green Spring, W. Va. I have always been actively engaged in Sunday School and church work ever since a child, and have held responsible positions at different places and different times. Recently I have been elected assistant superintendent of Sunday School. Have been teacher and organist for years. How does that correspond to I. Cor. 14: 34, 35?

At the time when Paul wrote, social conditions in Corinth and throughout the civilized world were very different from those of our day. Woman's status, too, was different. He wrote to a great extent to meet existing local conditions. The passages in I. Cor. 14: 34-36, it is believed, were designed as a rebuke to the public activities of a certain class of women in Corinth, whom he desired to hold up as a warning to the women of the Christian Church and an example to be avoided. Those conditions applied only to the time and place for which they were written. This is the interpretation of the passages in question by the best modern Bible scholars.

M. J. B., Niles, Mich. When and how did Thanksgiving Day originate? Was ever any other than the last Thursday in November appointed and celebrated for Thanksgiving Day?

It owes its origin to the desire of the Puritans for greater simplicity in the forms of worship in the Established Church; and a resolve not to celebrate any of the numerous festival days of that church. Mention is made of several thanksgiving days appointed for special reasons before the adoption of a fixed date for annual thanksgiving. Thus, after the first harvest in Plymouth, in 1621, Governor Bradford appointed a thanksgiving, and again in 1623, in July, he ordered a thanksgiving day for rain. The Dutch governors of New Netherland and the English governors of New York appointed days of thanksgiving, but not every year, nor on the same date. During the Revolution, a day was annually recommended by Congress and observed by the nation, but there was no national appointment between 1784 and 1789, when President Washington recommended a day of thanksgiving for the adoption of the constitution. After that date, special days were designated by presidents and governors until 1864, when the custom of a fixed annual date became a national one.

A letter from a correspondent in San Pablo, Laguna, P. I., informs us that an attempt is being made to swing the Philippine Independent Church in Manila off the line of orthodoxy. Recently addresses have been delivered and published, attacking the Bible as being in conflict with science. Our correspondent comments in these words: "Can the Christian nations where the Bible is universally accepted stand for this attack of a Filipino leader against the Bible? We Filipino Christians, over in this part of the world, who read your paper, should not be led astray from our belief in the old Bible." In his letter, our correspondent enumerates all the familiar, threadbare arguments that have been used for the last twenty years by the enemies of the old Book. These assaults, which are revived from time to time, ultimately defeat themselves, as their object becomes better known and as their shallowness is realized. We are sending our correspondent some literature on the subject which will undoubtedly prove helpful.

S. V. C., Lakeville, N. S. 1. Please explain Matt. 24: 30. If the "elect" are among the tribes of the earth, why should they mourn? 2. Is Mary Devereux, author of From Kingdom to Colony, living?

1. There is no suggestion that the elect should mourn. The expression "all the tribes of the earth" is a general one. (See the parallel passages in Mark 13: 27 and Luke 21: 5-36.) 2. She was still living at last accounts, and residing in Ohio.

G. C. M., Richmond, Va. The passage in Matt. 16: 18 has already been discussed from every standpoint. As Peter was the first of the apostles to confess Christ, so he was the first to get his apostolic commission. Moreover, he was the first (on the day of Pentecost) to open the door of faith to the Jews and then, in the person of Cornelius, to do the same to the Gentiles. In the list of the apostles, he is always first named. It is clear, however, that in the whole New Testament record there is not a single circumstance showing that Peter ever claimed or exercised any authority in consequence of the incident in Matt. 16: 18, nor was any authority conceded to him on that account by his associates.

W. H. H., Gastonia, N. C. Please explain Ps. 90: 3.

This passage is from a psalm, the authorship of which is attributed to Moses, and which was preserved through all the centuries up to the days of Solomon, as a part of the Jewish hymnal or collection of psalms. It deals with the transitoriness of human life, and points to God as our only permanent and abiding hope and "dwelling-place." In this sense alone, if in no other, it is a psalm of tremendous importance, as showing the belief among the Israelites at the time of the Exodus, in a future life. The passage in verse 3, "Thou turnest man to destruction," is interpreted as meaning, "Thou turnest him to dust"—to the common fate of the grave; and "Return, ye children of men," simply means to return to the dust from which they came. The same sentiment is expressed in Ps. 104: 29; Ps. 103: 14; Eccles. 12: 7. The whole psalm is a sorrowful appreciation of the shortness of human life, and the necessity of rendering service to God while we have the opportunity.

H. K., New York. Assuming that there are two men; both have the same amount of capital, but one has in addition more intellect and a more thorough knowledge of worldly affairs and believes that without prayer his material wealth can be increased to his advantage. His home life is happy and he has numerous friends. The other, though personally asking for guidance through prayer, and with the same amount of capital, through some misfortune, or, as the world will say, short-sightedness, if not stupidity, loses all and puts his family in distress. The fortunate man will say, "Now, what does your church-going amount to?" My children are getting a good education, whereas you are deprived of all luxuries of life." I read in Isa. 45: 13, "I will direct all his ways." Don't you really think a man may pay too much attention to spiritual things, and if he adapts himself to worldly methods, he would be much better off?

Your case reminds us of the illustration Jesus used on more than one occasion, when he spoke in parables to his followers. He pointed out to them the care, the skill, the ingenuity and the diligence which the people of this world applied, so successfully, to their business affairs, and showed that if the same excellent qualities which they used for mere worldly purposes were applied by the "children of light" for the advancement of God's kingdom on earth, they would be effective. Now, one of the best qualities in the world is the quality of consecrated common-sense, and if a man hasn't got this quality, no matter how good a Christian he is, he will get along very poorly in comparison with those who have it. Solomon prayed for one great gift—the gift of wisdom, of understanding. We should be wise as serpents, even while harmless as doves. There are many of us who might confine our petitions, for a time at least, to the much-needed gift of common-sense. No one can succeed in business without the necessary training and without the indispensable diligence. We have no right to expect that our heavenly Father will make up the lack of those things in us which we ourselves ought to cultivate, and without which no success is possible. But, after all, even if we miss that which the world holds so dear, we may take consolation in the knowledge that we are laying up treasure where there are no bankruptcy courts, nor harassing creditors, nor moth nor rust to corrupt, nor thieves to steal.

C. G. B., Detroit, Mich. Concerning the gift of tongues, we have no doubt that in the days of Paul there was a great deal of trouble in the church on that account and many conflicting opinions. All the spirits are not of God, and it is well to try them, as the Bible suggests. Writing of tongues, Paul says distinctly in I. Cor. 14th chapter, "Let all things be done unto edifying. If any man speaketh in a tongue, let it be by two or at the most three, and that in turn; and let one interpret: but if there be no interpreter, let him keep silence in the church, and let him speak to himself and to God." In other words, any message claiming to be in a tongue, yet which could neither be understood nor interpreted, was, in Paul's view, unfitted for delivery in the church or in public at all. This is precisely THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S position. God is just as able to bestow the gift of tongues today as he was at Pentecost; but we want to be sure that it is the divine gift and not a counterfeit, sent to delude and mislead.

J. M., Jersey City, N. J. Versatility is no doubt a fine thing in art and literature, indeed it may be ranked as a virtue; but in morals and religion it is a doubtful asset. I read lately that at the British Congregational Union's autumn session, Dr. Reginald Campbell and Dr. Forsyth (who lately had a tilt on theology) were both on the platform. During his address, Dr. Campbell used these words, which I assume to be correctly reported: "Jesus Christ is the central factor of my spiritual life. I worship him; he is the centre of my life; I trust my sinful soul to him forever." These are words of faith and were so accepted by Dr. Forsyth and the entire audience, who cheered loudly. But the other day, Dr. Campbell preaching in a New York church gave a radically different view. How do you reconcile these two different views?

We don't try to reconcile them, as Campbell may not be correctly reported. We prefer to wait for something more authentic than newspaper reports, which are liable to err in theological matters. It is well to give him an opportunity for a full hearing on his "New Theology." His full message will no doubt enlighten people as to what his views really are.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. E. K. E., Buffalo, N. Y. There may be good reasons why a pastor cannot be in his own pulpit every Sunday. We should not be too quick to judge by appearances.

R. S. J., Brighton, Mich. Attorney David Paine, 31 Nassau Street, New York, gives this answer to your query: "Under the facts here given, there seems no bar to your taking out second papers now. It must be attended to not later than June 29, 1913, however. You must, when you apply for second papers, have with you two witnesses, both citizens, who have known you five years and who can swear that you have resided in the United States for that period. The cost is four dollars."

B. McM., Millington, Mich. What you write of the Catholic Church is no doubt quite true. In many parts of the world it has encouraged idolatry. It has been guilty of great excesses and has made many martyrs for conscience' sake. But we must not forget that it is still a Christian Church in the sense that it believes in Christ as the Son of God. There are so many, many faults in ourselves that might call for criticism that we should hesitate before judging or condemning others.

E. M., Conway, S. C. Jesus was "in all things as we are, yet without sin." He was human as well as divine, mortal in the fleshly sense as well as immortal and eternal; subject to the weakness of body and spirit to which we are subject, to cold and hunger, to trial and temptation, to sorrow and joy. We cannot go beyond the record; but surely the record is enough, for no one was ever so tried and tempted. We do not agree with you that to show his sinlessness impairs the completeness of his work and the efficacy of his sacrifice. He stood as a model for us of what man should aspire to be. He demonstrated that a pure life of service, based upon absolute faith in God, could accomplish all things; he repeatedly asserted this to his disciples who, after his ascension, emulated his example as far as human beings could do so, in giving themselves wholly over to God on faith, even joyfully yielding up their lives. He showed by his own words that he voluntarily laid down his life and could take it up again, and added, "No man taketh it from me." If there had been one flaw in the perfection of the model, one incomplete act in the sacrifice, that incompleteness would have marred the whole.

"CRAFTSMAN" HOUSE PLANS FREE

Designed by GUSTAV STICKLEY

Send 6c for a copy of "24 CRAFTSMAN HOUSES," showing exterior and floor plans of 24 houses that cost from $900 up to build. To interest you in our magazine, "THE CRAFTSMAN," our FREE HOUSE PLANS, and 10 Craft articles, we will also send you a beautifully printed 32-page booklet entitled "The Craftsman House." If you are interested at all, both of these books will be very useful to you.

"THE CRAFTSMAN IDEA" means REAL HOMES, not mere houses: it shows you how to save money on useless partitions—how to avoid over-decoration, how to get wide sweeps of space (even in a small house), restful tones that match and blend—and enables anyone to always have a beautiful and artistic home.

"THE CRAFTSMAN MAGAZINE" treats of building, furnishing and beautifying homes—of art—embroidery—cabinet work—and kindred topics. In the Magazine each month are published the plans of two new and entirely different houses. Already we have shown 120 houses, and you can have your own choice.

"CRAFTSMAN HOMES," by Gustav Stickley, 205 pages, beautifully bound and printed, treats of home building, home making, home furnishings in full.

Killed Testing an Aeroplane

PROFESSOR JOHN J. MONTGOMERY of Santa Clara College, California, a well known educator and inventor, was killed in the foot-hills near the little town of Evergreen, Calif., on November 1, while making a flight in an aeroplane of his own invention.

Professor Montgomery claimed to be the discoverer of the generally accepted form of the biplane and that prior to the advent of the Wright Brothers he announced to Santa Clara College, where he was a member of the faculty, that he believed he had solved the problem of sustained flight. Almost immediately thereafter, he gave successful public demonstratons of his flying machine, which was propelled not by a motor but by wings employed much the same as a bird employs its wings in flying.

Professor Montgomery always deprecated the wild speed of aviators and warned them that they were not making scientific progress by either aspiring to great height or flying at great speed. Professor Montgomery, who was fifty years old, was one of the leading authorities in electricity and chemistry, and by his teaching, writings and inventions had made his name widely known and had brought fame to his alma mater.

The Triumph of Dry Farming

IN WRITING in the Herald of Home Missions, Rev. Josiah McClain gives an interesting article on the progress of dry farming in the desert sections of some of the Western States. He says: "The work of dry farming, a new departure, ten years old, is attracting great attention. Eight hundred thousand acres of desert land under dry farming yielded a crop of wheat, oats and barley this year. For ten years the wheat crop on the dry farms has averaged twenty-three bushels per acre. This comes from the lands once regarded as absolutely worthless. But the secret of dry farming has been discovered, which is this: the farmer tills, fallows and mulches his land, so that the precipitation for the entire year is retained in the soil instead of being allowed to evaporate. Then hardy varieties of grain must be selected which will burrow deep enough into the soil to utilize this stored moisture. One million seven hundred thousand acres of desert land adapted to dry farming are now opened to entry in Utah. Each man is, under certain conditions, allowed 320 acres. We have eight hundred thousand acres of desert land producing wheat, oats and barley under dry farming methods, where no water can be obtained save from the snow and rain in the winter and spring."

The Queen of the Swazis

THE present queen of the Swazi (Southeast African) nation is Ndhlovakazi, a woman of vast physical proportions, of mature years, and well versed in the wisdom natural to the heathen African. She professes to be friendly to Christianity, welcomes speech on sacred matters, and bows reverently in prayer. All this strongly reminds one of the attitude of King Mtesa for a long time after Stanley so romantically entered Uganda. A Christian schoolmaster every Sunday morning goes to remind the Swazi queen that it is the Sabbath Day, saying, "Queen, you must not send the people to the gardens, for it is the Lord's Day." And she is often seen at the services. On her own royal kraal there are twenty souls who weekly seek guidance and encouragement in class-meeting, and within a twenty-mile radius of the royal village there are two hundred persons meeting in class.

We Get a Slap

The big coffee trust, made up of Brazilian growers and American importers, has been trying various tactics to boost the price of coffee and get more money from the people.

Always the man who is trying to dig extra money out of the public pocket, on a combination, hates the man who blocks the game.

Now comes a plaintive bleat from the "exasperated" ones.

The Journal of Commerce lately said: "A stirring circular has just been issued to the coffee trade." The article further says:

"The coffee world is discussing what is to be the future of coffee as a result of the campaign of miseducation carried on by the cereal coffee people. We have before us a letter from one of the largest roasters in the South asking what can be done to counteract the work of the enemies of coffee.

"The matter should have been taken up by the Brazilian Gov't when they were completing their beautiful valorization scheme."

Then the article proceeds to denounce Postum and works into a fine frenzy, because we have published facts regarding the effect of coffee on some people.

The harrowing tale goes on.

"Where a few years ago everybody drank coffee, several cups a day, now we find in every walk in life people who imagine they cannot drink it. (The underscoring is ours.) Burly blacksmiths, carpenters, laborers and athletes have discontinued or cut down the use of coffee. As there is not a person who reads this and will not be able to find the same conditions existing among his own circle of acquaintances, is it not well for the Brazilians to sit up and take notice?"

Isn't it curious these "burly" strong men should pick out coffee to "imagine" about? Why not "imagine" that regular doses of whiskey are harmful, or daily slugs of morphine?"

If "imagination" makes the caffeine in coffee clog the liver, depress the heart and steadily tear down the nervous system, bringing on one or more of the dozens of types of diseases which follow broken-down nervous systems, many people don't know it.

But it remained for the man who has coffee, morphine or whiskey to sell, to have the supreme nerve to say: "You only imagine your disorders. Keep on buying from me."

Let us continue to quote from his article.

"Notwithstanding the enormous increase in population during the past three years, coffee shows an appalling decrease in consumption."

* * * * *

Then follows a tiresome lot of statistics which wind up by showing a decrease of consumption in two years of, in round figures, two hundred million pounds.

Here we see the cause for the attacks on us and the Brazilian sneers at Americans who prefer to use a healthful, home-made breakfast drink and incidentally keep the money in America, rather than send the millions to Brazil and pay for an article that chemists class among the drugs and not among the foods.

Will the reader please remember, we never announce that coffee "hurts all people."

Some persons seem to have excess vitality enough to use coffee, tobacco and whiskey for years and apparently be none the worse, but the number is small, and when a sensible man or woman finds an article acts harmfully they exercise some degree of intelligence by dropping it.

We quote again from the article:

"These figures are paralyzing but correct, being taken from Leech's statistics, recognized as the most reliable."

* * * * *

This is one of the highest compliments ever paid to the level-headed, common sense of Americans who cut off about two hundred million pounds of coffee when they found by actual experiment (in the majority of cases) that the subtle drug caffeine, in coffee, worked discomfort and varying forms of disease.

Some people haven't the character to stop a habit when they know it is killing them, but it is easy to shift from coffee to Postum, for, when made according to directions, it comes to table a cup of beverage, seal brown color, which turns to rich golden brown when cream is added, and the taste is very like the milder grades of Old Gov't Java.

Postum is a veritable food-drink and highly nourishing, containing all the parts of wheat carefully prepared to which is added about 10 per cent of New Orleans molasses, and that is absolutely all that Postum is made of.

Thousands of visitors to the pure food factories see the ingredients and how prepared. Every nook and corner is open for every visitor to carefully inspect. Crowds come daily and seem to enjoy it.

Some Little Stories of Animals

An Impatient Monkey

STEADILY increasing crowds daily watch the feeding of the chimpanzees at the Bronx Zoo in New York. "Baldy" is perhaps the favorite, owing to his clownlike capers; but the serious acts performed by "Susie" have won much praise. "Little Dick," the small chimpanzee who jumps with such alacrity into the doll's carriage to be wheeled by "Susie" about the arena, has been several times in the hospital, owing to extreme impatience at mealtimes. He has a habit of pounding on the rear door of his cage as the feeding hour approaches. If keepers fail to notice this signal of his readiness to be placed at the table, "Dick" thumps the door with his head, and spins about in such a frenzy of rage that his cage-mates fly before him. In one of these impetuous exhibitions "Dick" broke his leg. A plaster jacket was applied, and with this the chimpanzee—to the great alarm of his keepers—used to pound vigorously on the floor to attract attention! A boy was assigned to watch and control the patient, and Dick's eccentric and very rough usage of his injured limb played havoc with the nerves of the nurse. The plaster jacket was finally removed, and the chimpanzee discharged as cured. About ten days later "Dick" was again in trouble, presumably from pounding with his feet against a metal door. This time a femur was dislocated. "Dick" is once more out of the hospital, but his impatience is far from being cured.

Lady's Adventure with a Bear

MR. DENIS CRANE, the well-known Methodist writer, in a recent article in the Methodist Recorder, tells of a tour he has recently taken in Canada. "Canada," he says, "has an area thirty times the size of Great Britain, and boasts twenty-five thousand miles of railway, yet I ran across two London friends, one in the streets of Saskatoon, and the other, thrice, without design, in widely distant parts of the country. In the train, between Banff and Calgary, I fell into conversation with a Scotchman, a tourist from the Antipodes, who chanced to be personally acquainted with my brother-in-law in Wellington, N. Z. This gentleman was accompanied by his sister, and it was she whom the bear adventure befell. While staying at one of the mountain hotels she went out for a ride alone. Returning in the dusk through the woods, she met a fine specimen of the black bear. Bruin was only on his way to the local scrap-heap, where his kind gather nightly to lick out the delectable preserve tins; but the lady's horse took fright, and bolted into the woods. After receiving one or two nasty bruises from collisions with the trees, the rider flung herself from the saddle, preferring to take her chance with the bear rather than with the horse. When she regained the road, however, bruin was briskly retreating in the direction whence he had come, by far the most scared of the three."

Bathing Tigers

THE two Siberian tigers, which are now being shown at the Bronx Zoo in New York, exhibit a trait very unusual in cat animals, and that is a habit of going into water. The male of this really magnificent pair of great cats will not only stalk into the pool in their cage, but lie down in the water, drop his meat to the bottom of the tank, then "duck" for it. These animals are far less spectacular in their summer coats than during the winter, when they are covered with hair so long and fluffy it seems like a good imitation of wool. They give promise of attaining huge proportions. This northerly phase of the tiger attains the greatest size to be found among the big cat animals.

You Can Raise Ducks Without Water

—not without water to drink, of course—but without water to swim in. Maybe you didn't know this.

Maybe you have a whole lot of mistaken impressions about ducks—and maybe you've got the notion that ducks don't pay.

But no matter what you have heard or thought to the contrary, there is big money to be made from ducks—and you can make it as well as the next man.

Ever hear of the Weber Brothers? They own a hundred-acre duck farm up in Massachusetts. Started with just a few ducks (their original investment was only $175) and now they have an automobile, a hunting camp in Maine and all the other good things that come with acute prosperity. Ducks did it.

You can judge for yourself the profit possibilities of even a few ducks when we tell you that Weber Brothers make and that each adult duck produces eighty-five ducklings in the ten months constituting the season. Eighty-five times 50c equals $42.50 profit per duck.

50c Profit on Each Duckling

The experiences of the Weber Brothers with ducks are fully related in a book published by Farm Journal for the benefit of its subscribers. This book covers the duck raising proposition from A to Z, and does it in a simple, clear and thoroughly understandable way. It gives all the methods, rules and secrets of the Webers in full. It shows you that you can raise a few ducks on a back lot, without swimming water, at a proportionate profit to that earned from ducks by the Webers. This book even goes so far as to anticipate any possible question by devoting several pages to questions and answers which completely supplement the information contained in the body of the book. From it you can quickly and easily learn all there is to know about duck raising, and if you conscientiously follow its teachings

"Duck Dollars"

You Can Surely Succeed With Ducks

Weber Brothers started with chickens, but were led to experiment with ducks and soon found that they could do better with them. They are hardy and easy to keep—require no expensive grains for feeding and are exceptionally prolific. Aside from the extraordinary demand for ducks—a demand always greater than the supply—there is a ready market for duck eggs, many people preferring them to hen's eggs.

We are not recommending duck raising as a business and "Duck Dollars" as a text-book without knowing our ground. When we first read the book we were doubtful and Weber Brothers had to actually show us before we were convinced. Now we are so powerfully impressed with the success of the Webers, and so thoroughly convinced that their methods can be profitably applied, with a few ducks or many, that we want to give widest distribution to "Duck Dollars." It is the policy of Farm Journal to forward the prosperity of the farmer and poultryman in every possible way, and we are making it easy for everyone to own this valuable book by offering

"Duck Dollars" at once, postpaid, and Farm Journal every month for four years both for $1

"Duck Dollars" will equip you for a highly profitable business or one that you can follow in a small way to make pin money, and Farm Journal will be of real money-making and money-saving value to you. It treats of every branch of farming in a crisp, bright, practical way which makes it the most readabl as well as the most helpful farm paper published. It is the welcome monthly visitor in 800,000 homes, and is equally well loved by every member of the family. It is cut to fit you and your family and you'll get more entertainment and downright value out of it than any other paper you read.

The main Welch plant at Westfield, N. Y.

Because we make Welch's so good we have to make twice as much of it

In Collier's of September 2d, WELCH'S was the only grape juice listed under the heading

"Here are foods that are pure"

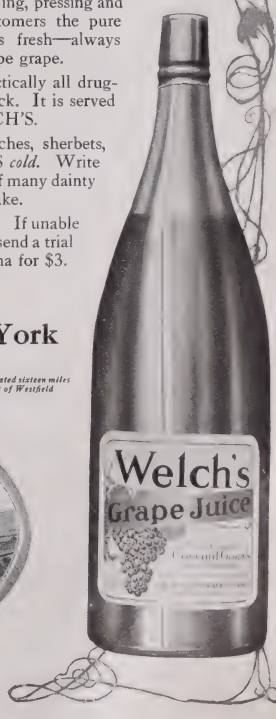
By purchasing, at receiver's sale, the Walker Grape Juice plant at North East, Pa., we double our present manufacturing capacity and meet the largely increased demand for

Welch's
The National Drink
Grape Juice

The Walker Grape Juice plant was built two years ago. It is thoroughly modern, constructed of reinforced concrete. Its output—Walker's Grape Juice—was widely advertised and widely distributed last year.

Our purchase included the land, buildings, machinery and corporate franchises of the company, at receiver's sale. We took over no grape juice.

With the necessary changes and the installation of some new machinery to make the plant conform to our process it is now a WELCH factory.



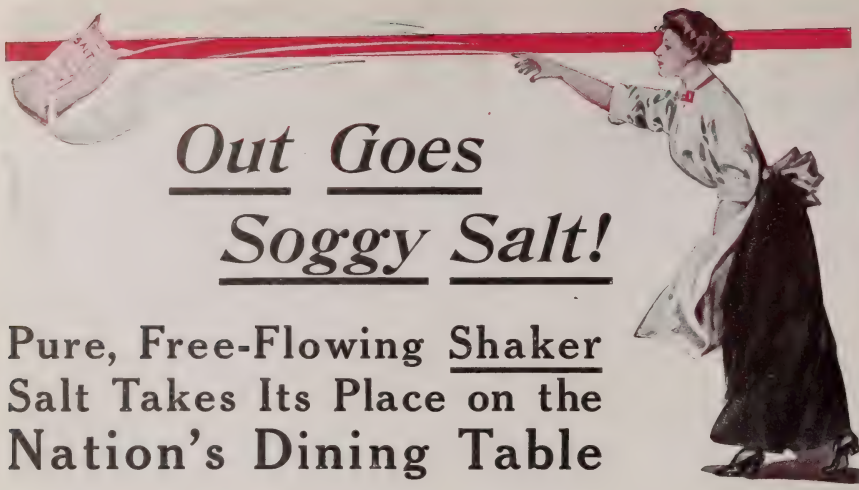
This new plant is just sixteen miles from Westfield, where our general offices are located, and where our main plant is operated. Westfield is in the heart of the Chautauqua grape belt, in which the Concord reaches its highest state of perfection. North East is just near enough to enable us to run both plants upon our plan of handling and pressing the grapes within a few hours after they leave the vines.

The Concord grapes this year were magnificent. Our policy of paying a bonus above the market price for our choice of the best grapes, brought to us, fresh from the vineyards, the very pick of the crop; our own process of washing, stemming, pressing and bottling immediately gives to our customers the pure juice of the richest Concords—always fresh—always delightful, with the aroma of the full-ripe grape.

WELCH'S is sold everywhere. Practically all druggists and grocers have it constantly in stock. It is served at all good fountains. Insist on WELCH'S.

Keep a case in the house for punches, sherbets, desserts, etc. Always serve WELCH'S cold. Write us for our free booklet of recipes, telling of many dainty desserts and delicious drinks you can make.

Four-ounce sample bottle by mail, 10c. If unable to get WELCH'S of your dealer we will send a trial dozen pints express prepaid east of Omaha for $3.



Do more than ask for grape juice—ask for Welch's—and get it.

Out Goes Soggy Salt!

Pure, Free-Flowing Shaker Salt Takes Its Place on the Nation's Dining Table

Bag Salt, with its soggy lumps, its dangerous gypsum and untidiness has been expelled from a million American homes since the discovery of Shaker Salt.

The women who have the most consideration for their families' health and who take the greatest pride in the food prepared in their homes, use Shaker Salt exclusively.

This does not seem unusual when you consider the ultra-purity of this extra-fine-grained salt, how freely it flows in the dampest weather, and how all food is more daintily seasoned by its use. Is it then strange that the most progressive housekeepers have allowed this pure, fine-grained salt to take the place of common table salt?

The No-Gypsum Salt

Gypsum (Plaster of Paris) is common to all ordinary salt. This dread impurity forms gall stones and gravel. Serious kidney trouble often results from gypsum in food. Our exclusive process removes the gypsum, lime and all other impurities.

Shaker Salt is, therefore, safe salt. Because of this wonderful purity it happily lacks that rank, bitter taste of COMMON salt.

Questions and Answers

M. R. F., Indianapolis, Ind. Please explain Rom. 10: 2.

The apostle here referred to the fact that though his people were well-meaning and earnest, they were still spiritually blind. Their zeal was therefore misdirected, since they had rejected Christ and had set up their own righteousness as all-sufficient, believing that they could not serve God acceptably except through the works of the law. This was the peculiar sin of Israel, on account of which it could not attain to true righteousness and redemption.

A. C. H., Portville, N. Y. What is the explanation of Eccles. 10: 2?

The right hand is more expert than the left, and the godly wise man is more on his guard than the heedless sinner, even though he may make an occasional slip. In such a man, the heart—or the moving principle of life—is proverbially said to be in the right place, and consequently will lead him right, being inspired with the spirit of righteousness. The "fool's heart is at his left," means that he is governed by impulse or emotion, and not by right understanding. Of course, the saying is a figurative one, and has no reference to the location of the heart at the right or left side of the body.

A. E. P., Schuyler, Neb. What is the meaning of Luke 14: 26?

In this passage our Lord asserts his claim to supreme affection. In taking up one's cross to follow him, we must be prepared for trials for his sake, and to break even the nearest and dearest ties, if need be. It may come to choosing between Christ and our nearest relations. Compare Matt. 10: 37 with the passage in Luke 14. "Hate" is not the preferable word, as the passage in Matthew shows. The real meaning is that we are to love him better than all else, and that this love must assert itself loyally at the crisis, no matter what it may cost us.

J. L. H., Pacas, Va. 1. Is it right to beg and persuade any one to be a Christian? 2. Please explain Matt. 12: 36, 37, also Matt. 22: 32. 3. What did Jesus mean by saying God was not the God of the dead but the living?

1. Yes, absolutely right; indeed, if we do not spread the Gospel by word and deed, we are criminally remiss and will have to answer hereafter for wasting our opportunities to win souls for Christ. You may remember the beautiful passage in Daniel 12: 3 about the soul-winner shining "as the stars for ever and ever." 2. This was a warning against heedless, frivolous talk, and those thoughtless words which, uttered without premeditation but recklessly, often do infinite harm. For instance, mocking at religion, or at virtue, or indulging in exaggeration or profanity or gossip that may merge into slander. All of these, besides being a sinful waste of time, are evil in themselves and will have to be accounted for. They proceed from the heart and are an index of its character and condition. 3. "Not the God of the dead but of the living" is interpreted as meaning that in his view or estimation, all live unto him (see Luke 20: 38). Here, however, there is a distinction which points to those who are accounted worthy to attain eternal life, as being specially meant. If the Lord's patriarchal servants had no existence at the time when Christ spoke of them, then it would have been folly to call him the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. But he was still their God and had prepared a place for them (see Heb. 11: 16), and as if to destroy all doubt on this point, Jesus himself (in Matt. 8: 11) makes a clear and unequivocal declaration on the subject. Some of your other questions are purely speculative.

J. R., Leland, Ill. With what metal are the sides of steamships covered? How thick is it, and how is it fastened on?

Modern steamships are built of steel plates varying in thickness from a quarter of an inch to about an inch and a half. These plates are fastened with rivets to the steel ribs of the hull of the vessel.

E. A. S., Provincetown, Mass. Please explain Ps. 37: 24 and Micah 7: 8.

This is an answer to the objection often raised that one sees the godly brought low in the world, for it assures us that God will not let him remain so, but will raise him up again. Through his own weakness, the believer may slip and fall; but the good work having begun in his heart, the Lord will "perform it unto the day of Jesus Christ" (Phil. 1: 6). The passage in Micah is of the same character. The great enemy is continually at war with the believer; but God fights on the side of righteousness, and is ever ready to reach out his hand to save those who have faith in him and look to him for succor.

J. McG., Brooklyn, N. Y. Is Christianity Judaism with its hopes fulfilled?

In a sense it may be so claimed, since it came to us through Jewish sources. Judaism is the old, dead formalism, with its hopes and expectations still unrealized, while Christianity is the new revelation produced by the advent of the Messiah and his acceptance by nearly 500,000,000 of the earth's population now living and an almost innumerable multitude since the Saviour appeared. There is at the present time an estimated population of less than 12,000,000 Jews on the globe—the smallest, numerically, of any of the great religious systems.

E. C. C., Maynard, N. Y. 1. Will we rise bodily on the judgment day? 2. Will a true Christian after death see Christ and the angels of God? Will we see all our friends who have gone to heaven before us?

1. See this whole subject fully set forth in I. Cor. 15th chapter. A vast amount of philosophic conjecture has been expended and many books have been written about it, but the fact remains that nowhere is it more clearly and comprehensively stated than in this chapter. The belief in the resurrection of the human body has apparently been fortified by the well-known passage in Job 19: 26, which in the old version was mistranslated, but is corrected in the Revised to read "yet without my flesh shall I see God." All the evidences go to show that while the body to be raised shall be such as to preserve identity, it will be a purified, changed and spiritualized body, with the grosser material elements removed or so transformed as to render them fit for heaven and immortality. It shall become a glorified body like unto that of Christ. (See I. Cor. 15: 49; Rom. 6: 9; Phil. 3: 21.) The bodies of those who are alive at the last day will undergo a similar miraculous purifying transformation without death (see II. Cor. 5: 4; I. Thess. 4: 15; Phil. 3: 21). 2. Yes. We have Scriptural evidence to justify the belief that we shall be able to recognize our friends and loved ones in heaven, and that the redeemed will know each other (see II. Sam. 12: 23; Luke 16: 23; Rev. 6: 9, 10; I. Thess. 4: 13-18; Heb. 13: 17; Matt. 8: 11; Eph. 3: 15; and other passages). That Jesus himself will be known to believers is made clear to us in his own words in John 14: 2, 3.

J. S. L., Minerville, Calif. We have a Sabbath School about five weeks old, and I think the first since 1849 or 1850. I am teacher of the Bible class. Last Sabbath, I was asked the question: "What did Jesus mean when he said: 'As the serpent was lifted up in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up'?"

Jesus' death on the cross was an uplifting, and in this sense it is compared to the uplifting of the brazen serpent. In both cases the remedy is divinely provided and there is another striking similarity: As death came to the Israelites in the wilderness by the serpent's sting and life came by the uplifting of a serpent, so, in redemption, by man came death, and by the death of the God-man in the likeness of sinful flesh comes life eternal. In the first instance the cure was effected by directing the eye to the uplifted serpent; in the other, it takes place when the eye of faith is fixed upon the uplifted Christ. The reason for this is given in verse 16.

C. P. E., Syracuse, N. Y. In the Lord's Prayer why do we ask God to "lead us not into temptation," when in I. James we read that "God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man?"

A better rendering and one more fully in accordance with the spirit and meaning of the passage is "suffer us not to be led into temptation." The petition as it stands is simply a humble expression of self-distrust and shrinking from danger; it is a prayer against yielding to temptation and is equivalent to asking for support and deliverance when we are tempted. Our Lord himself taught his disciples to pray against this danger, when he said in the garden, "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation."

The Vision in the Cabin

IN ONE of his beautiful stories, Tolstoy, the great Russian novelist, tells of a poor peasant who was a devout Christian. He was a man of kind heart and gentle disposition; a hard worker and one who had suffered many buffetings from misfortune, but who still, even with his scant means, found opportunities to do good. The peasant had a vision. It seemed to him that the figure of the Saviour came to him while he slept, and told him that he would come to his poor cabin the next day. When the peasant awoke he vividly remembered the dream. His heart burned within him, for he felt certain that it would come to pass and that he would see the Master. How often he had prayed that He might come, and now He was coming! He would honor with his divine presence and beneficent smile the dingy little room and bless it forever after. So the peasant set about to prepare for this event. The day was stormy and bitter cold and a biting sleet was falling. He dusted and swept the little chamber, replenished the logs in the rude fireplace and put on the customary pot of cabbage soup. He had part of a loaf of bread, and this, with the soup, constituted his larder. But poverty was nothing; he was rich in the promise of the Master's coming.

The Late Count Leo Tolstoy

SO HE watched from his window, hour by hour. The village street was well-nigh deserted. Presently he saw a peddler, half frozen and numb, struggling under his pack, fighting the stinging blast. Seeing the man about to fall, the peasant flung open the door and was just in time to catch the tottering figure. He pulled the peddler into the cabin, set him by the fire, warmed him back to life and fed him with the cabbage soup; then, when he was fully restored and refreshed, he set him on his way again. Next, a poor woman—a bedraggled creature—awoke his sympathetic heart. Her, too, he took in and warmed and fed, and dried her tattered garments and, wrapping his coat about her, sent her away stronger and happier.

DAY wore on towards late afternoon and, in the growing dusk, he perceived a child lying prone on the street, overcome by the storm. The peasant ran out, gathered the little one, cold and unconscious, up in his wide blouse and took him in. It was a long struggle to revive the half-frozen child, but at last he succeeded. With a small pan of warm milk and the remnants of his loaf of bread, he fed this little sufferer until the child fell asleep, smiling and contented, in the settle before the blazing logs.

"Ah!" sighed the peasant, as he looked out of the window to the street, "the Master! the Master said he would come, and it is nearly night."

HE sat down by the fire and gazed long at the happy face of the sleeping child. In his heart there was at once a great sorrow and a deep sympathy. Presently he fell into a doze. Suddenly the room seemed to lighten about him. A mild radiance illumined it which did not emanate from the dying embers in the fireplace. Looking up, he saw that he was not alone with the sleeping child. There stood the Master, white-robed and gazing down upon him with a smile. "Ah, Master!" he said through half-open lips, "I have waited and watched the long day, blessed Master; but thou didst not come, and now 'tis night."

THE Master spoke in soothing tones. "Three times to-day have I visited thy cabin. That poor peddler whom thou rescued and fed—that was me; she to whom thou gavest thy coat, that also was me; and this child whom thou hast saved from death, that is me; for inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me." The vision faded; the peasant sat upright. He was alone with the sleeping child, who still smiled in his sleep; but he knew that the Christ had come to his cabin that day.

W. J. W. C., Santa Maria, Calif. The "evening and the morning were the first day," is simply the old Jewish method of reckoning the complete day, from sunset to sunset. Creation is too large a subject to discuss in THE MAIL-BAG.

O. E. U., Newark, Ill. While what you say about the condition of sinful man is unquestionably true, there is another side to the picture. Those who have been transformed by grace and are journeying heavenward have no excuse for pessimism. A gloomy Christian, therefore, is an anomaly. As for human logic, why, you can prove anything you please by means of it; but even logic cannot alter facts. We have known Christians who were poor, old, feeble and almost friendless, yet who were happy in spirit, sunny in temperament, kindly in disposition and supremely blessed in their abounding faith in God's love and mercy. They did what they could for others as they journeyed on, and left all the rest, including worries, burdens, and troubles such as those you write of, far behind them.

MAKING READY FOR CONGRESS

By WALDON FAWCETT

THERE is not a householder in the country who "cleans house" more thoroughly each autumn than does Uncle Sam in his role of steward of Capitol building at Washington. There is this ference, however, that in the case of the officials in arge of the great white-domed building on Capitol ll, the housecleaning extends not merely over eks, but months. No sooner has one session of ngress adjourned than a small army of renova-s, repairers and reconstructionists invades the big ilding to set things in order for the next period of wmaking.

It is expected that the approaching session of Con-ess will be a long and exceptionally busy one. nergetic efforts have been made to have everything apple-pie order for the coming of the lawmakers. ie session preceding a Presidential campaign is ways one of unusual activity, particularly in the ie of oratory, and as the tariff will be a leading pic at the ensuing session, a strenuous season may anticipated. The officials at the Capitol look for session that will continue until July 1, 1912, and ve laid in supplies accordingly.

Several of the committee rooms have been refur-shed and redecorated. The introduction of vacuum eaning has greatly lightened the work in contrast ith the days when thousands of square yards of rpet had to be taken up and put down again every mmer. Many legislators will find new sanitary eel bookshelves in their rooms. The most conspicu-us improvement is in the restaurants. None of the gislators go home at the noon recess and a consid-rable number take the evening meal at the Capitol, hile some few occasionally sleep on the couches in their offices and are consequently on hand for break-fast. Changes made during the past six months will enlarge the restaurant space and facilities, not only in the Capitol proper, but in the adjacent Senate and House office buildings, and will provide several pri-vate dining-rooms where members may entertain parties of fellow-legislators. Finally, each branch of Congress will henceforth enjoy the luxury of an up-to-date dairy lunch, so that in the opportunities for rapid refreshment the members and their assistants will be on a par with our busy business men in the centres of trade.

During the past year, the monster power-plant, which is located some distance from the Capitol, and which is to furnish light, heat and power for that building, the offices and the Library of Congress has been completed and placed in operation. This new arrangement eliminates dirt and danger from fire. It will also render available a good deal of much-needed storage space. There being no further need of boilers and machinery in the Capitol basement, this obsolete equipment is being removed and the space will be used for storage. An experimental in-stallation has been made of a powerful pneumatic tube system, designed for the quick transfer of books, public documents, and bulky pieces of mail. This tube connects the Capitol with the Representa-tives' office building, and if it proves a success, it will probably become one link in a chain that will connect all the Department buildings in Washington with the Capitol, the Government Printing Office, and the post office through which Congressional mail is dis-patched.

Another improvement this season at the Capitol is the installation of a new ventilating and refrigerat-ing system, which is now under way. The new system will perform a variety of functions, even hav-ing "units" in the kitchens; but its main purpose is to afford better ventilation in the legislative cham-bers, which have no outside windows, but are lighted by skylights. By the new system the air will be changed frequently, without causing draughts. In the Senate chamber the ventilating system will have a "reversible" operation; the bad air may be drawn out, and then, by the simple turn of a lever, fresh air will be forced in.

Some time ago, the lower House virtually decided that its present meeting-place was too large to per-mit of speakers being heard to advantage. It was proposed to take out the members' desks, and by placing the chairs closer together, so economize in space that the size of the room could be cut down fully one-third. Congress appropriated money for the reconstruction, but left it to a commission; but suddenly there came a new turn of affairs which up-set all calculations. This new factor was the Con-gressional reapportionment, which will increase the membership of the House to four hundred and thirty-three. Now it is apparent that the smaller legislative chamber, proposed under the new plan, would barely accommodate the prospective increase in membership, and might prove inadequate if there was another increase as a result of the next national census. Many Congressmen now feel that it would

The Rich Man and The Poor Man

A Thanksgiving Sermon

By Charles M. Sheldon, D.D.

Pastor, Central Congregational Church, Topeka, Kan. TEXT: "Every day will I bless thee; and I will praise thy name for ever and ever." Ps. 145:2.

A PARABLE

ONCE on a time there were two men who lived in the same place, side by side—one rich and the other poor. Each of these men lived a complaining life. Neither was happy. Neither was ever known to give thanks for anything.

The Rich Man

The rich man daily said to himself: "Who could be more miserable than I? In the first place, I live a life which is envied by others who do not know my circumstances. Every one I meet casts at me the evil eye, thinking that I am blessed above my fellows, simply because I have money. More than that, I am hated by the great majority of the poor simply because I am rich. In addition to that, I am surfeited. My money has made possible for me all kinds of luxuries. I have tested all sorts of amusements. I have traveled everywhere. I have in my possession every sort of curiosity in the way of valuables, curios and collections of art. There is nothing new under the sun for me. In addition to this, I am worn out in the constant struggle to maintain my position and make more money, which is the lot of all rich men. There is no place for me to stop if I would maintain myself in the great struggle of the rich against the rich. In addition to this, my life is burdened with a multitude of beggars. My correspondence is loaded with appeals from the ends of the earth, from all sorts of people, worthy and unworthy. This burden has become intolerable and I have finally shifted it off upon the shoulders of a number of secretaries. Added to this is the fact that I am not well. My pleasures have not brought me health, but rather illness, and I suffer from a number of chronic complaints which make life unbearable. But the crowning source of my unhappiness lies in my domestic troubles. My wife has secured a separation from me. One of my daughters has married a nobleman, has quarreled with him, and is now seeking a divorce. My oldest son now leads a dissipated, useless life. My youngest boy is vicious and a spendthrift in his habits. Of all unhappy men I am the unhappiest, on account of the fact that I have really no home."

The Poor Man

In like manner also the poor man daily made his complaint over his hard lot. He said: "It is a daily struggle with me to meet my honest obligations. I can never earn enough to pay off the little mortgage on my home. The daily wages which are paid me are so small in contrast with the high cost of living that if I were to lose a week out of my working life, it would take me months to catch up again. I live a life of ceaseless toil. My children are poorly dressed. They are objects of scorn on the street and in the schoolroom. I have no standing in society, but am simply one of the great mass of common toilers. There is no hope in my life. I have no spirit for travel, no vacations such as rich men have, no variety by way of absence from the common tools I am obliged to handle. In other words, I live a hopeless, unhappy existence, because I am so poor."

The Angel

An angel of the Lord, whose business it was to visit from time to time such men as these, both rich and poor, suddenly revealed himself one day to the rich man as he was brooding over his unhappiness, and said to him: "I have a message from the Almighty, that you have left of your earthly life one year more. In that year it is permitted you to find out the secret of a happy life; and I am permitted to say to you, by Him who is my Lord and King, that the first thing you must do is to become conscious of the fact that you are a redeemed soul, made in the image of God and saved eternally by the life and sacrifice of Christ. If you become conscious of this redemption you will at once begin to live an entirely new and happy life." With these words the angel vanished out of his astonished sight.

The same day this angel paid a visit to the poor man, the rich man's neighbor, and repeated the same message, leaving the poor man in astonished bewilderment at the message from on high.

The Change in the Rich Man

Then the rich man realized that he had one brief year of life, and began to contemplate the great fact of his redemption; and when it burst upon him in all its beauty, he rose from his place of complaint to live a new life in the year which remained to him; and at once he began to find things for which t thankful. His eyes were opened to the visior what money can do if used for the relief of suf ing. He saw at once what a great force it is in secrated hands. He went forth from his sel complaining to scatter the blessings which so times nothing but wealth can give, and at once t came into his life a great multitude of friends. poor blessed him as he went his way. The lifted up their hands in prayer in the hospital w he had builded. The distressed and uncared thought of him as they waked in the morning some quiet place of refuge. Before the year ended he had thought of his neighbor, this man, and had given him the blessing of a m needed rest with his family, and had in a quiet unadvertised way relieved him of some of his sha est needs. And when the end of the year was dr ing near, no man in all the world was more thank than this rich man, because he had caught the vis of redemption.

The Change in the Poor Man

In like manner the poor man, as he dwelt on great fact of redemption thro Christ, began to count up his n cies. He recalled the fact that was well. He had never been obli to cease work on account of sickn He called to mind the fact that wife and children were also well strong and that they loved him votedly. He was reminded of fact that in spite of his poverty, could enjoy the commonplace thi of the world into which he was b He was not harassed by the care great wealth or the administra of a great business. He had many friends who surely had loved him on account of his we but had been true to him in all troubles; and so he also, as the man, was able to come to the en his one year, daily giving thanks God on account of his great rede tion, which was the crowning th in all his life—so great that it m everything else shine with gl Thus these two men, the rich and poor, were taught by the angel mercy the real reason for thanks ing in each life; and from a life complaint and unhappiness w transformed into a life of every praise.

The first essential for a thank life is a consciousness of a redempt life. No man can bless God ev day or contain this spirit of than giving unless first of all he is him conscious of his own personal demption. The possession of we or the absence of it has no mean when it comes to thanksgiving. fact, it is probably literally true t between the two, the rich and poor, there are more unhap thankless rich people than poor p ple. Jesus said, "Blessed are poor," in Luke's Gospel; he did add the words which we find in Beatitudes, "in spirit," but distinc and positively said that the "po were happy or could be. But it is significant that he never said anythi of the same kind about the rich. other words, the possession of thi is the last reason in human lives thanksgiving. It is in a majority cases probably a hindrance to soul in getting into close cont with God and living a thankful li

THE TOILER'S THANKSGIVING

By Rose C. Webb

O FORTUNATE man! Thou who must work
To earn thy bread, who canst not shirk,
Nor pass in idleness one hour,
But hast the needed strength and power
To press straight on, to fight thy way,
And prove a victor in the fray,
While many a man of countless wealth
Would give all for thy priceless health;
Would envy e'en thy peaceful sleep,
Which tortured mind and body keep
Far from him. And when morning breaks,
And every living thing awakes
To take its place in God's great plan,
'Tis then that thou, O toiling man,
Shouldst lift to God a thankful heart,
That thou dost have so great a part!

And if a little home be thine,
Where twinkling lights their welcome shine,
Where wife and children wait to greet
Their dearest one with rapture sweet,
Then, friend, to me thy humblest meal
Would be a feast; then would I feel
Once more the warmth and happy glow
That lived and died so long ago,
When passed from earth to realms above
My treasures all, my home and love.
Be thankful, friend! for with the best
And choicest gifts thou'rt surely blest.
Though hard and grimy be thy toil,
Thy heart nor life it need not soil.
And on this glad Thanksgiving Day,
Oh, fail not from thy heart to say:

"Dear Lord, for all thy gifts to me,
I lift my heart in praise to Thee;
For food and raiment, and for health,
More precious far than fame or wealth;
For home and friends; for loved ones near,
To comfort, sympathize and cheer;
For faith, that bids me do my best,
And leave in Thy dear hands the rest;
That lightens e'en the darkest day,
And brightens all my homeward way.
When night-time comes, oh gift most blest!
The sweetness of the toiler's rest!"

COUNTLESS BLESSINGS

SOME things there are we cannot count—
The stars, the sands upon the shore,
The grain that made the golden sheaves,
The leaves upon the forest floor.
Through naked boughs we see the sky,
We walk beneath the autumn sun,
And lift our praise to One on high
Whose gifts our measure overrun.

The happy times we've had at home,
The day that saw the baby's birth,
The mornings full of eager tasks,
The evenings, sweet with household mirth.
We thank our Father for the grace
That makes the daily burdens light,
For little things that pleasure us,
For steadfast courage to be right.

But most we thank the love that kept
A watch above us night and day;
In trouble sent an angel band
About our faltering steps to stay;
Against the tempter armed our souls,
And helped us onward in the road
By which the ransomed of the Lord
Are safely led to Love's abode.

We thank our Lord for kith and kin,
We thank Him for our own free land;
For mighty harvests gathered in,
For every open heart and hand,
But most we thank Him for Himself;
Beyond all gifts the Giver is.
We lift to-day our joyful song
That Christ is ours and we are His.

Oddities in Public Speaking

TO THE close observer, there is no more interesting study than is to be found in the wide variety of mannerism, method and voice among our public speakers. Spurgeon, who was gifted with a keen eye as well as a ready wit, made a special study of pulpit voices. He wrote:

"By far the large majority of our preachers have a 'holy tone' for Sundays. They have one voice for the parlor and the bedroom, and quite another tone for the pulpit; so that, if not double-tongued sinfully, they certainly are so literally. The moment some men enter the pulpit, they no longer speak as men, but a whine, a broken hum-haw, an 'ore rotundo,' or some other graceless mode of noise-making, is adopted, to prevent all suspicion of being natural and speaking out of the abundance of the heart. There are two or three modes of speech which I dare say you will recognize as having frequently heard. That dignified, doctorial, inflated, bombastic style, which I have just now called the 'ore rotundo,' is still admired by some. There is another style, a method of enunciation said to be very lady-like, mincing, delicate, servant-girlified, dawdling. We have, most of us, had the felicity of hearing these, or some others, of the extensive genus of falsettos, high-stilts, and affectations. I have heard many different varieties, from the fulness of the Johnsonian to the thinness of the little genteel whisper; from the roaring of the bulls of Bashan up to the chip, chip, chip of a chaffinch. Understand that where even these horrors of sound are natural, I do not condemn them—let every creature speak in its own tongue; but the fact is, that in nine cases out of ten, these sacred brogues are unnatural and strained.

"A sharp discordant squeak, like a rusty pair of scissors, is to be got rid of at all hazards; so also is a thick, inarticulate utterance in which no word is complete, but nouns, adjectives and verbs are made into a kind of hash. Equally objectionable is that ghostly speech in which a man talks without using his lips, ventriloquizing most horribly. One of the surest ways to kill yourself is to speak from the throat instead of the mouth. Avoid the use of the nose as an organ of speech, for the best authorities are agreed that it is intended to smell with. Speak as educated nature suggests to you, and you will do well; but let it be educated, and not raw, rude, uncultivated nature. Demosthenes took, as you know, unbounded pains with his voice, and Cicero, who was naturally weak, made a long journey into Greece to correct his manner of speaking."

Once a Year, Thanksgiving

By EUGENE THWING

ONCE a year Thanksgiving! Prosperous business and good crops, pleasant homes and genial friends, fair weather, luxury, comfort, ease—all the delights commonly called blessings—for these the annual thanksgiving is uttered in words and in music by multitudes of complacent voices.

All through the year, the days come to us laden with blessings. We gather them gladly, and when their number has multiplied past counting, we devote a single day of the year to giving thanks for all.

Thanks*giving*—an outward expression, a compliance with popular custom, a polite acknowledgment of agreeable external conditions—thanksgiving—easily rendered, lightly regarded, easily forgotten—once a year.

Thank*fulness*—a deep, glowing fire of the heart, a passion that relates itself to the profound things of life, a glad and eager recognition of and response to the wonderful goodness of God. It cannot exist without finding utterance in thanksgiving, nor can it be restricted to days or seasons. A whole year or a lifetime is all too short to satisfy its ever-increasing desire for expression.

"THE wonderful goodness of God." What does the phrase mean in general acceptance as applied to-day? Do not ask the man or the woman who has nothing but sunshine. Ask one who has come through the valley of the shadow; ask one who has come up through much tribulation; ask one who has struggled and fought, who has felt the hot flame of trial; ask one who has beheld the glory of the Cross; ask one who has been exalted to the honor and dignity of sacrifice and service. Among these only can be found real thankfulness, expressing itself in thanksgiving.

Give thanks for all the obvious blessings which have come to be regarded as necessary to happiness; then consider some of the more "wonderful" blessings, not so often recognized, which make for joy rather than for happiness. Difficulties, obstacles, hardships, sorrows—how often are they included in the list of blessings for which thanksgiving is rendered? When did ever a man or a woman do a great thing for humanity and for God without the preparation of difficulties and hardships overcome or sorrows endured?

Who is the "good soldier" but he who can "endure hardness"? Who is the successful business man but the one who has surmounted obstacles? Where is the hero who never knew a trial? How shall we know a friend until tested and proven by adversity? From whom can come the priceless gift of salvation but from the "Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief"? The most wonderful blessings are not found in the bright garden of pleasure, but in the shadows of Gethsemane.

Does the Marathon winner, before he starts on his long endurance race, give thanks for the ease of a morris chair and the pleasures of a banquet table? The greatest blessings to him have been the hard training and the stern self-sacrifice. The business man who has mastered his difficulties and obstacles and found in them the preparation for large success can look back at them and recognize them as the real blessings of his life, and then, conscious of his gain from them of character, and strength, he looks forward at much larger tasks and "rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race."

THE only thing worth while in life is service to others—a life that will brighten and lift up all it touches. Any trial, any hardship, any victory over difficulties that can give the sweetness and strength for such a life of cheer and helpfulness is a "wonderful" blessing. The soul in need does not appeal to weakness for succor, but for strength, and "we that are strong (in body or in spirit) ought to bear the infirmities of the weak." It is our sweetest and noblest privilege. Shall we not give thanks for any experience that fits us for it?

The grinding and crushing and greed of business life, the burden and the pain in all walks of life, give glorious opportunities to the strengthened, purified, valiant soul. He who came into a sinful and suffering world with miracles of love and healing uttered his most inspiring message when he said: "He that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do." Certainly he spake not to cringing, doubting, selfish, or ease-loving men. His promise, his wonderful legacy, was for those who are willing to gain through pain and struggle his meek and kingly spirit. Is there any more wonderful blessing to be thankful for than such a legacy and the experiences which fit a man or a woman to claim it?

A THANKSGIVING PRAYER

I Thank Thee

For the daily task, a little too big and a little too hard for my present ability, and for the daily increase of power that comes to meet it; for the trial that comes to strengthen and purify and not to destroy; for the opportunity to give that makes me richer; for the privilege of service that proves me not worthless in the world; for the unspeakable honor of working with Thee and meeting some need that thou hast of me—which I cannot understand but can believe; for the Friend who walks with me shoulder to shoulder through the valley of the shadow, and then with a glad face and ringing voice grips my hand as we climb together the bright hills of victory; for the loyal and sympathetic friends near and far—thou knowest the number of them—who inspire and help me, and, best of all, who believe in me; for the past, because it is past, and because it was necessary in thy providence, and because it held the beginnings of all things now cherished; for the present, because it is the only time which I can claim with certainty for doing the things that must be done, and because it is full of opportunity and the beginnings of greater and better things; for the future, which, though it is only a hope and purpose, holds bright visions that beckon me on and challenge me to do my best to-day; for Happiness, of which thou hast given me a generous share; but more for Joy, which thou wouldst not limit, as thou wouldst not limit obedient and loving service; for thy provisions, thy providence, and thy promises, and for the certainty gained from experience that thou dost hear and answer the cry of need, and therefore that thou wilt accept the thanksgiving of an eager, grateful heart—dear Lord and Father, I thank thee.

LOVE AND MERCY

GLORY to the Father give,
Glory, glory, glory!
Through His loving grace we live,
Glory, glory, glory!
Ours the hope of sins forgiven,
Hope for endless joys of heaven.
Joy and gladness crown our days,
Let us ever sing His praise.

To God's love and mercy cling,
Oh how great a treasure!
Loudest praises we will sing,
Who their worth can measure?
Lost because of sin, we roam
Far from God and far from home.
We His love and mercy see
In the Cross of Calvary.

Gladly we will sing God's love,
Love and mercy ever;
He to earth, from heaven above,
Came, our chains to sever;
Came, in person of His Son!
Fought our battles, fought and won.
Where the thorns once pierced His brow,
Rests a crown of glory now.

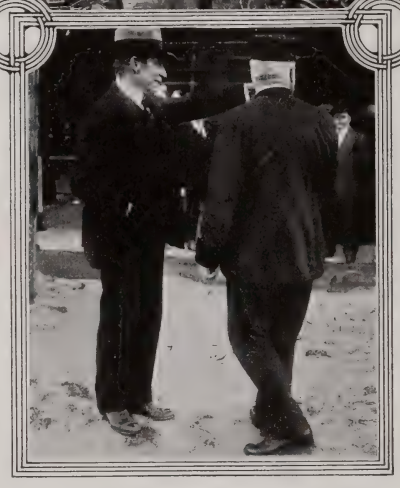
Passaic, N.J. JOHN R. MORSE.

Women Warriors

IT IS often said of women that they cannot fight. It is certainly far from pleasant (to the minds of most of us) to think of our mothers and sisters as donning the garb of the soldier and enduring the hard marches and fierce battles of our "mobilized" armies. We love to think of woman as the presiding genius of the well-ordered home; and that her share in the patriot's duty is to stay "by the stuff," as the Scripture phrase is, and to rear the soldiers of the future. That seems to the just mind quite as valuable a service as is that of actually handling the musket and sabre "at the front." But there have been many cases of women who have gone forth, when they felt that their country needed them, to fight beside their brothers.

Every one knows the story of the Amazons; of Zenobia of Palmyra, of Joan of Arc, Boadicea and other heroines of the centuries that lie far behind us; but not so well advertised have been the military achievements of certain brave women, some of whose contemporaries are still living. The Molly Pitcher of our own Revolution had a worthy rival during the Civil War in the person of Mrs. Katy Brownell, who served successively in the First and Fifth Rhode Island regiments, and was several times commended and promoted for faithfulness and efficiency. During the late Spanish War, the beautiful widow of Dr. Rizal created a sensation by assuming command of a regiment of insurgents in the Philippines. Her husband was a Filipino sympathizing with the Americans. For this crime, he had been accused of treason by the Spanish, and had been shot. His wife decided to devote the rest of her life to the cause for which he died. Her company was composed of picked marksmen, who, within a few weeks after she took command of them, won several engagements. It was said that when the body of Dr. Rizal was delivered to his family, his sister found in his bootleg a stirring ode which he had written in prison, and in which he adjured his countrymen never to forsake the cause of liberty. This ode was printed and distributed among the troops.

In 1827, when little Greece was engaged in a mortal struggle to free herself from the Turkish yoke, her women armed themselves extensively, something which had been done before when a people had been in similar straits. Among these patriotic women was a certain Elene Constantinides, a girl of "electrical beauty" and great enthusiasm. When asked why she had stepped so far outside of the conventional duties of her sex, she replied, "The Turks killed my brother and they have killed many others of my family. I desire to avenge their death; but far deeper than any personal motive lies my love of my native land. The Turks would take the life of Greece even as they have taken that of my brother. I feel that I am solemnly called to do my part in my country's defense."



To Cross the Atlantic by Airship

THE preparations to cross the Atlantic Ocean by airship, which Mr. Melvin Vaniman has been carrying on for about a year at Atlantic City, are now nearing completion. A week or so ago, Mr. Vaniman brought out the great dirigible balloon, to which the name Akron has been given, for its first trial. Naval and military experts from the United States and Canada had been invited for the occasion and ten thousand people from Atlantic City had gone out to the Inlet to see this, the largest balloon which has ever been constructed in America. The attempt to make a trial flight that day was unsuccessful, however, as it was found that the motors and propellers were not arranged in such a way as to work properly together. One of the big propellers stripped a gear, necessitating the replacing of the ship in her hangar for the day.

Crowds Viewing the Great Transatlantic Balloon at Atlantic City

The first real trial trip was made on November 4. Mr. Vaniman, with the four men who are to accompany him upon the transatlantic attempt, went up in the big balloon, although they knew she had just sufficient gas to lift them and no more. They had counted upon the gas expanding and becoming more buoyant as the sunlight strengthened, but to their disappointment a cool wind blew up heavy clouds which obscured the sun and caused the gas in the balloon to shrink. The trip ended rather disastrously in the shallow waters of Grassy Bay, inside the treacherous Barkentine Reefs. As soon as it was learned that the airship had grounded a number of volunteers in motorboats started to its assistance, but as the tide was low it was impossible for them to get near it in any other craft except those little flat-bottomed boats used by duck hunters, and which are colloquially known as "sneakers." The United States life-saving power boat Vigilant attempted to reach Mr. Vaniman and offer assistance. After a time they were able to get anchors to the big balloon and fasten her in such a way that she was perfectly safe until the tide rose and the motor boats were able to go in and tow her out.

Melvin Vaniman Explaining Details to an Official

Although the connecting rods joining the aft engine to its propeller gear were broken by the fall, those closely connected with the operation of the Akron were not disappointed in the flight even in spite of the accident. Mr. Vaniman said that the successful flight over Atlantic City which preceded the fall had taught them a number of the peculiarities of the balloon and had convinced him fully that she is capable of making the transatlantic trip.

Mr. F. A. Seiberling, who is the financial backer of the undertaking, has recently stated that it will be against his judgment if any attempt to make the long flight is made this fall. He believes it would be a very unwise risk, owing to the possibility of meeting a sleet storm, which would immediately condense the gas of the balloon and force her into the water. Mr. Vaniman is still anxious to make the attempt this season, as he feels that the eye of the public is upon him and that it is waiting for him "to make good." As the matter stands at the present time there is no decision as to whether the flight will be made this fall or early in the coming spring.

Rear-Admiral Leutze, commandant of the New York Navy Yard, has been instructed to keep in touch with the aeronaut Vaniman, and to detail two warships to follow in the wake of the airship as far as practicable if the start is made this fall. It is understood that the warships which will trail Vaniman's dirigible will be the scout cruiser Salem and one of the torpedo boat destroyers, probably the Reid. The Salem is commanded by Commander George R. Evans and the Reid by Lieutenant Commander John S. Doddridge. The two vessels are among the fastest of their type afloat.

THE CENTENNIAL OF STEAM ON THE OHIO

WITH a great tooting of whistles, waving of flags, and cheering of thousands of people gathered on the Monongahela wharf at the foot of Wood Street, Pittsburg on October 31 celebrated the centennial of the first steam navigation of the Allegheny, the Ohio and the Mississippi Rivers. A replica of the New Orleans, the first steam vessel ever floated from Pittsburg to New Orleans, proudly backed out from the wharf and led a long procession of river craft down the Monongahela to the Point and thence up the Allegheny to Pittsburg's Sixth Street bridge, downstream again to the Davis Island dam at Bellevue and back to the starting place.

Mrs. Alice Roosevelt Longworth was chosen to christen this little boat, which formed the central feature of the celebration. Nicholas Roosevelt, a granduncle of Mrs. Longworth and uncle of the former President, built the original New Orleans, and piloted her on her first trip down the Ohio and the Mississippi to the city for which she was named. That was four years after Robert Fulton had launched the epoch-making Clermont on the Hudson.

In spite of the fact that it was a rather unpleasant day—for though the rain had stopped the air was still filled with chilly mist and more rain threatened to fall every moment—an immense crowd had gathered upon the wharf and nearby points of vantage, when President Taft arrived aboard the New Orleans at half past two. As Mr. Taft walked up the gangplank, Mrs. Longworth officially christened the quaint little steamer with the name of the boat she was built to represent. The whistles on the boats that had gathered for the celebration then turned loose all the noise that whistles could produce and for ten minutes the President stood waiting for a chance to make himself heard. When at last the din had ceased, Mr. Taft recalled the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the first steam navigation in America and lauded the names of Fulton, Roosevelt and Livingston. He spoke of Pittsburg's debt to the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers, and brought cheers from the crowd when he mentioned the project of the dredging of a nine-foot channel down the Ohio to the Mississippi, which would put that city in direct water communication with the Panama Canal.

The Decorated River Boats Drawn Up Along the Bank for the Celebration

Every obtainable craft about Greater Pittsburg was enlisted for the day's event and every river man was anxious to make the celebration a success. The flagship Virginia was decorated with bunting and flags and the gold and black colors of the city.

MRS. PETER WIGGS' THANKSGIVING PARTY

By Susan M. Griffith

"WELL, Mrs. Wiggs, I reckon there'll be no Thanksgiving in your house or mine, this year," sighed the above lady's nearest neighbor, Mrs. Nathaniel Green, as she entered the pleasant kitchen, settled herself in a convenient chair, and threw her shawl and fascinator over the back of it. "With Mary gone to Japan, and Jerome in California, and Richard off to the ends of the earth in another direction, you won't feel much like feasting and frolicking, I'll warrant; and as for me," wiping her eyes with a corner of her gingham apron, "I can't think of having company or going anywhere since my husband died. I feel as if it would be almost sacrilege to think of such a thing for one minute. Oh, my, my! the sorrows of this world!"

Mrs. Wiggs was sitting in a low rocking chair close beside the clean kitchen table, peeling apples for mince pies. She was a smiling, happy, wholesome looking woman, and her gurgling laugh, which shook her fat sides and brought out the dimples in her fat cheeks, was good to hear.

"Why, what kind of talk is that, Mrs. Green?" she asked, in her comfortable, cheerful voice. "Do you think pa and I are going to stop living because the children have all grown wings and flown away to other parts of the world to make nests for themselves? Tut, tut, nonsense! That's no way to look at things. Have Thanksgiving? I guess we are going to have Thanksgiving, and the very biggest one we've ever had."

"You are? Well, I don't see how in the world you can do it," said Mrs. Green, looking exactly as if she were going to a funeral. "You always set such store by your children, Mrs. Wiggs, Mary especially. Seems like you and Mary were more like twin sisters than mother and daughter. If I were in your place, I'd be crying my eyes out day and night, instead of fixing for Thanksgiving."

"Well, that wouldn't do you any good, would it?" said Mrs. Wiggs, eating a slice of apple with great enjoyment. "And I'm right sure it wouldn't be showing a thankful spirit. Now, it does look to me that Thanksgiving is a special day for giving thanks for the mercies of a whole year, and we ought to keep account of what the good God has given us, and done for us, and bring a remembrance of them before him like a feast of fat things. I believe he loves to have us rejoice and be happy, and it makes a body feel a whole lot better than to sit down alone in a dark room and wet up two or three pocket handkerchiefs with a flood of useless tears.

"Now, let me tell you, Mrs. Green, how it is with me. When Jerome married and went to California, it hurt; of course it hurt; but I said to myself, 'Well, now, it's all for the best. The boy has a chance for a fine position; the big West is full of new life, and the very place for young men like Jerome. They love to see things moving, and they love to help to move them, and I felt proud to know that he is one of the kind that knows how to do it. Then, since he had that attack of pneumonia from which he barely escaped death, his lungs have been weakly, and the doctors and everybody said it would make a new man of him, which it has already. And I laid that up on my memory shelf as a big cause for thanksgiving. Then, when Richard got a chance to go to South America as a civil engineer, I felt dreadfully; it seemed so hard to give him up; but when I got to thinking about it, I knew he would never have obtained the appointment if he hadn't been extra good at his trade, and it really made me proud and satisfied and grateful that I had two such good, industrious, capable sons, that can go ahead and lead men and help in the progress of the world.

"And, then, Rick does send me such long, lovely letters every week, telling me all about the country and his work, and making everything as plain as if I was right along with him; and—well, I just said God knew best about Richard, too, so I put his case up on my memory shelf also."

"'If I were in your place, I'd be crying my eyes out, instead of fixing for Thanksgiving'"

Mrs. Wiggs paused here and ate two more slices of apple thoughtfully.

"I guess you ain't come to the hardest part yet," said Mrs. Green, with another funereal shake of the head. "Mary's going is what hurt you the worst. That pretty near killed you. You never said anything, Mrs. Wiggs, but there's other ways of telling the truth besides giving it mouth."

Mrs. Wiggs' eyes were brim full of tears, but she smiled as she wiped them hastily away with her apron.

"Yes," she said, "Mary's going was the hardest; I'll own that. She was my only girl, and it seems more natural for boys to go off than girls, but I have really got more satisfaction out of it than anything that ever came into my life. I feel as if my heart had wings sometimes; as if I couldn't keep down, but wanted to fly right up toward God and heaven, because I have one child, and a daughter at that, who is glad to give herself entirely to Christ and his cause. I am so proud, I feel so blest, that God has enabled me to give a missionary to Japan, and a good one, Mrs. Green; for Mary is so bright and smart that languages come easy to her, and the way she makes those little Japs love her—oh well, you know! Everybody always gives their hearts to Mary at first sight."

"So they do, bless her, so they do," sobbed Mrs. Green, quite overcome. "I've missed her so in my trouble. If she had been here when my husband died, seems as if I could have borne it better. But she wrote the sweetest letter; you know I read it to you and we both cried over it. I never in the world get tired of reading that letter, Mrs. Wiggs. It seems just as if Mary had run in as she used to do when I was in a worry over something, and was sitting close beside me, talking her dear, sweet, comforting words into my ears."

"Well, now, you see I have ever so much to be thankful for," said Mrs. Wiggs, "and if you won't be offended and will take it from Mary's mother, I'll say that you have, also. You've lost your husband, it is true, and a good, kind husband; but he left you well provided for, and you have your sister to live with you and be company for you, and I do say she is one of the very best women in the world. Let me tell you what I am going to do to make Thanksgiving the gladdest, happiest day in the year. You see, I know what Mary would like better than anything, and that is for me to do something for her Sunday school girls. They are all working girls, you know, and seldom get invited out, and I know it will make Mary perfectly happy to have them all here to Thanksgiving dinner. So I have sent an invitation to every one of them, and they are every one coming. Then, you know how Richard was always looking out for all the lonely, homeless young men? Why, I got so I used always to set on an extra plate or two Sundays, and he nearly always brought one or two home with him to dinner. So, now, I've got Mr. Wiggs to inquiring around and finding out the very loneliest—a good many are mere boys from the country, you know, and just as homesick as they can be—and we are going to have them in for Thanksgiving dinner too; and the girls—Mary's girls, you know—will help me to serve the dinner and entertain them."

"Well, I do say, Mrs. Wiggs, such a plan actually thrills me all over. I can just imagine, if I was one of those girls, what it would be to me. Why, I do declare, if it doesn't most make me want to do something for somebody myself! What are you going to do for Jerome?"

"Well, you know he was Sunday School superintendent for five years before he went West, and he always gathered in a big harvest for the poor on Thanksgiving. So pa and I are going to carry out his programme just as near as we can. We've been agitating the subject for more than a month, and I guess we are going to have a lot donated. I'd be glad to have you help in this, Mrs. Green. We are going to have a real nice programme along with it, and a kind of an old colonial supper; baked pork and beans, you know, hot rye and Indian bread, pumpkin pie, and doughnuts and seed cakes. Why can't you fix up something and go along? We'd love to have you, and I believe it would do you a whole lot of good."

"Well, I just do believe I will!" said Mrs. Green with sudden energy. "Your talk has been better than a sermon to me. Maybe I ain't done just right; I reckon I have indulged my misery a good deal, and, as you say, I have a lot of things to be thankful for. Yes, I've got a whole lot of clothing the poor may just as well have as not, and I can take in a good heap of potatoes and turnips and cabbage and such. Why, Mrs. Wiggs, sister and I'll both go and help you out all we can. And I can get up a first-rate Thanksgiving dinner myself, if I half try, and I have a good notion to do it. There's Dolly Ann's folks—I do really suppose I'd ought to make them a dinner, as they are too poor to have anything real nice to eat, and they'd be that proud to come. I always have hated to have them, because of the six children, and it's taking such a power of food to fill them up, but I guess I can stand it, as they're his kin-folks and he used to always want them over on a Sunday or holiday, or else send them over a whole mess of good things. Yes, I know it would please him for me to have Dolly Ann and the youngsters, and so I guess I will. And, if I'm going to, I'll have to be going and set about it; no time to waste."

A few moments more, in which the two arranged on certain signals in order to let Mrs. Wiggs know how things were moving, and Mrs. Green went home with a light step and actually a smile on her face.

The two days following were very busy ones, but that did not prevent Mrs. Wiggs from watching the signals from her pantry window. "There's a white one," she said to her husband delightedly. "That means she's got her turkey and chickens all dressed,

A Year's Blessings

ONCE more the American People, from coast to coast and from Lakes to Gulf, are about to unite in the celebration of our Annual Thanksgiving Day. At the ancient Jewish feast of Tabernacles—"the Festival of the Ingathering"—the people were required to appear before the Lord in the national sanctuary. Here, in a hundred thousand sanctuaries in city, town, village and hamlet, all dedicated to God's service, our people meet and voice their praises and their gratitude for the blessings of the closing year.

First and foremost, there are the prime blessings of national peace and prosperity. For these every citizen, whatever his church or denomination, or whether he be an "outer member" of the congregation, must feel in his heart the sincerest thankfulness. For abundant harvests, for public health, for a thousand material blessings, we unitedly bow the head in reverent recognition and gratitude.

But it is in the American home that the most sacred altar is raised to the Lord of the Thanksgiving Feast. In millions of such homes the families gather surrounded by their kindred, and enjoy the good things of the feast with due remembrance of the Giver of all good. Nowhere else in the world is there such a festival. It has become a characteristic part of the national life of our people, and every year makes the celebration larger and heartier and better.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family has special cause for Thanksgiving. In two years, it has added to its numbers over 100,000 new members. Each recurrent Thanksgiving finds it a mightier power for good than before. For what it has been enabled, under Divine guidance, to accomplish during the year in the spread of the Gospel, in deeds of love and kindness at home and abroad, in the uplift of the outcast and the neglected, in benevolence toward the poor and the homeless, and in many other ways, we, in common with all the rest of the Circle, feel devoutly thankful to Almighty God and deeply grateful for having been made the humble channel through which such blessings might flow to others.
